Although Nixon noted last week that the gravest difficulty would involve gasoline, he said the odds against national gas rationing have improved because of the federal government's efforts to up the available amount of the fuel and reduce consumption.

And the President said concern for the availability of gasoline would cause him to veto an emergency energy bill passed Wednesday by Congress.

The National Petroleum Council, an oil-industry advisory group, also voiced concern about the quantity of gasoline. It warned that reduced petroleum imports will force the nation to use even less oil this spring or face, as an ultimate solution, gasoline rationing.

The March 1 gasoline price increases, approved earlier by the Federal Energy Office, included: two cents a gallon for the service station operator, one cent a gallon for the whole-saler and any pass-through of higher prices refiners had to pay for crude oil. The highest increase at the pump was noted in Wisconsin - 13 cents a gallon for one brand.

The threat to veto the energy bill also involved prices. Included in the emergency legislation, which Congress had had since before Christmas, was a rollback of the price of domestic crude oil.

Nixon said the rollback - estimated to mean four cents less per gallon of gas at the pump.

-ultimately would reduce the amount of gasoline available. Other energy developments during the week:

-The FEO reduced the wholesale price of middle distillate fuel oil, including home heating oil, by two cents a gallon. Linked with the penny increase for wholesale gasoline, the reduction was intended to stimulate production of gasoline.

-The Shah of Iran said the United States is importing as much oil now as before the Arab oil boycott. FEO chief William E. Simon labeled the statement "irresponsible and reckless." He said America was importing six million barrels of oil a day before the embargo and said the previous week's statistics showed U.S. imports to be only 4.8 million barrels a day.

-Delaware and New York became the fifth and sixth states with mandatory gasoline distribution systems based on the odd-even Oregon system.

States comply with 55 mph law

Slow down!

Federal legislation requiring a nationwide 55-mile-per-hour speed limit takes effect Monday and an Associated Press survey shows the states have complied with the law.

The measure, designed to conserve fuel by forcing motorists to drive more slowly, was signed by President Nixon on Jan 2. It gave states 60 days to post a 55 m.p.h. speed limit or face the possible cutoff of federal highway funds.

The deadline actually was midnight Sunday, but the Transportation Department extended it to 12:01 a.m. EDT Monday in order to avoid weekend confusion.

All 47 states responding to the AP survey had moved to lower the speed limit by Sunday - some just under the deadline. Speed limits in most areas had been about 70 m.p.h. - with variations depending on the type of road and vehicle or the time of day. The new laws apply equally to all vehicles - cars, trucks and buses - and are applicable 24 hours a day.

Some states got a head start on the slowdown and federal officials said the lower speed limits saved lives. Dr. James P. Gregory, head of the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, said last week that there were 23 per cent less deaths on the nation's highway's in January, 1974 than in the same month of 1973.

California lowered the speed limit to 55 m.p.h. Jan. 1 and officials estimated the move would save 300 million gallons of gasoline annually.

Summing up Watergate:

"We wanted to keep the lid on."

By DONALD M. ROTHBERG
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Watergate scandal yielded its secrets slowly, grudgingly.

It began with a tenuous link to the White House. Now, men who had formed President Nixon's innermost circle of advisers stand accused of conspiring and lying to conceal their involvement.

And locked in a courthouse safe are findings returned by a federal grand jury about the role played by Nixon himself.

To John N. Mitchell, who believed that "the most important thing to this country was the re-election of Richard Nixon," the need in those days following tte June 17, 1972, break-in at Democratic National Committee headquarters was simple:

"We wanted to keep the lid on."

A willing and active participant in trying to keep that lid on the scandal was John W. Dean III, the White House counsel who came to see the cover-up as a "cancer growing on the presidency and that if the cancer was not removed the President himself would be killed by it."

The lid rattled a bit, but it stayed on through the 1972 election.

The cancer grew but the President seemed stronger than ever as he carried 49 states to sweep to a second term in a historic landslide.

But now, the lid is off, the cancer detected.

After a 20-month investigation, a federal grand jury spelled out Friday the "deceit, craft, trickery and dishonest means" by which men so close to the President sought to "obstruct and impede the due administration of justice."

They were charges unprecedented in American history. And they may yet be overshadowed by the contents of a sealed envelop handed to U.S. District Judge Judge John J. Sirica.

It is up to Sirica, already given much of the credit for cracking the Watergate case, to decide what to do with that sealed presentment. He only glanced at the first page and gave no hint of what he saw and what he might do.

The indictment gave some clues to what the sealed report might contain. While they carefully avoided any mention of the President, the jurors gave great weight to Dean's testimony about alleged offers of executive clemency, the raising of hugh money and Nixon's knowledge of what his subordinates were doing to keep the lid firmly in place.

It was learned earlier in the week that special prosecutor Leon Jaworski had decided that if any action against the President were warranted, the proper forum for it was the House of Representatives rather than the grand jury.

If Sirica agrees, the sealed report and the brown satchel filled with evidence that accompanied it will go to the impeachment inquiry already under way in the House. But the judge also will have to decide whether to release the report to the public.

The American people have waited a long time for the full story of Watergate.

Few of the thousands who flocked in a festive mood to Washington to see President Nixon inauguarted for a second term on Jan. 20, 1973, were giving much thought to Watergate. It had been a bizarre incident that had little effect on the campaign.

WATERGATE: the scandal behind the re-election campaign

Not more than a handfull of the spectators at the inauguration knew that Jeb Stuart Magruder, executive director of the inaugural committee, would be a witness three days later at the trial of the Watergate conspirators. Fewer still knew that Magruder planned to lie.

According to the grand jury, while plans were being made for the inauguration, other planning was under way in an atmosphere far more furtive-at times, desperate. The Watergate defendants wanted money for themselves and their families and, above all, they demanded assurances they would spend little or no time in prison.

It all started to unravel at 2:30 a.m. on June 17, 1972. Frank Wills, a security guard in the Watergate office building, noticed that the latches on two doors had been taped so they would not lock. He called the Washington police, who arrested five men inside Democratic National Committee headquarters.

They all were wearing surgical gloves and had electronic equipment with them. Police also found they were carrying $2,300 most of it in consecutively numbered $100 bills.

It wasn't until the next day that one of the five was identified as James W. McCord Jr., security coordinator for President Nixon's re-election committee.

In Los Angeles on June 18, Mitchell was quick to condemn the break-in:

"There is no place in our campaign or in the electoral process for this type of activity and we will not permit nor condone it."

According to the grand jury, on the 17th, as soon as he learned of the Watergate arrests, Mitchell met in Beverly Hills, Calif., with Robert C. Mardian, a former assistant attorney general who had followed Mitchell in joining the re-election committee.

Mardian was told to tell G. Gordon Liddy to try to get Atty. Gen. Richard G. Kleindienst to arrange for the release of the Watergate burglars. Liddy caught up with Kleindienst at about noon that day at Burning Tree golf course and the attorney general flatly rejected his suggestion of preferential treatment for the arrested men.

H.R. Haldeman, White House staff chief, was in Key Biscayne, Fla., with the President. Haldeman called Gordon Strachan, a member of his staff, and told him to make sure the files were clean. On orders from Haldeman, said the grand jury, Strachan destroyed documents on June 18.

The next day at Key Biscayne, Ronald L. Ziegler, presidential press secretary, described the incident as "a third-rate burglary attempt" and predicted some people "may try to stretch this beyond what is."

At the White House, John D. Ehrlichman, domestic affairs adviser to the President, told Dean to get word to E. Howard Hunt Jr. to get out of the country, the grand jury said.

Ehrlichman and Charles W. Colson, White House special counsel, also allegedly told Dean to take possession of the contents of Hunt's office safe.

The disclosure by The Washington Post on June 20 that Hunt's name had been found in address books belonging to the Watergate burglars provided the first public link leading directly to the White House, for Hunt also was identified as a consultant working for Colson.

Mitchell, Magruder and Mardian flew back to Washington from California and, on the evening of June 19, they met at Mitchell's Watergate apartment. Dean joined them and, according to the grand jury, Mitchell suggested that Magruder destroy material in his files.

During the same frantic few days, Liddy, who was counsel to the campaign finance committee, was spotted feeding documents into a shredder.

Hugh W. Sloan Jr., the committee treasurer, later recalled Liddy mumbling, "My boys were caught last night. I made a mistake by using someone from here which I told them I would never do."

What sent these men scrambling for their shredders and burn bags?

One thing was the Gemstone file, the fruits of the wiretaps installed in the Democratic headquarters during a break-in on May 22, 1972. From Room 149 of the Howard Johnson's Motor Lodge across Virginia Avenue from the Watergate, Alfred Baldwin, a former FBI agent, monitored the bugs planted May 28.

But Baldwin wasn't getting anything from the bug placed on the telephone in Democratic chairman Lawrence F. O'Brien's office. McCord and his crew would have to go back in to fix it, which they did June 17.

Magruder told the Senate Watergate committee he gave Mitchell Gemstone documents. Mitchell called his testimony "a palpable, damnable lie."

But the grand jury said that when Mitchell denied knowing about the Gemstone files or telling Magruder to "have a bonfire with them" his statements, "as he then knew were false."

Getting rid of incriminating documents could solve one problem. But what of the men arrested. How long would they remain silent?

It would take money, a lot of it, to make it worth their while to remain silent. They would need expensive lawyers and assurances their families would be cared for. One week after the break-in, Mitchell and Mardian met with Dean and, according to the grand jury, suggested that the CIA be tapped for secret funds to support the defendants. Ehrlichman also thought that was a good idea, the indictment said.

But officials at the CIA would have no part of the deal.

With the CIA out of the picture, Herbert W. Kalmbach seemed like a logical alternative choice. A low-profile California lawyer whose firm represented the President on personal tax and real estate matters, Kalmbach was a premier Nixon fund-raiser.

Kalmbach flew East in response to a call from Dean and soon the money began to flow, all of it in cash and most of it delivered by Anthony Ulasewicz, a former New York policeman.

On July 7, Ulasewicz delivered $25,000 to William O. Bittman, Hunt's attorney. Eleven more deliveries cited by the grand jury accounted for a total of $402,500 funneled to the defendants.

Meanwhile, on June 20, the President and Haldeman discussed the need for a public-relations counter-offensive to combat Watergate. The taped record of that conversation would be obliterated mysteriously 16 months later. How it happened remains under investigation.

That evening the President and Mitchell talked briefly on the telephone. No record of that conversation survives

Nixon had said little about Watergate until, at a news conference Aug. 29, he said Dean had conducted a thorough investigation and had repooted that "no one in the White House staff, no one in this administration, presently employed, was involved in this bizarre incident."

On Sept. 15, the grand jury indicted the five men arrested in the Watergate break-in plus Liddy and Hunt. That was it. According to Dean, the President was pleased.

Finally, the Nov. 7 election was over. The lid had stayed put.

Quinn contradicts

the reporters' job to ensure that."

Quinn indicated to Common Cause that he would not cooperate in their campiagn monitoring project, on the grounds that it was "an evasion of privacy."

"Frankly," Quinn wrote in a letter to Gifford last week, "I do not see the necessity, nor the value of your proposed monitoring project in light of the new law and the fact the information you said you would need is now being made available through the Secretary of State's office."

Since writing the letter, Quinn has reportedly learned that Common Cause also is requesting the occupation and employers of all persons contributing more than $100 — information which is not reported to the Secretary of State.

Quinn, according to an aide, regards that request as an evasion of his privacy and the privacy of his contributors.

Gifford said that while Massachusetts law does not require the reporting of contributors' occupations and employers, the information is required by new Federal campaign laws.

"Patterns of industries contributing to particular candidates," would be analyzed, he said.

Common Cause, Gifford said, would attempt to find out information about Quinn and any other non-participating candidates on its own.

Grand jury's Nixon report

After the grand jury gave Sirica its indictment and sealed report, the judge told the panel that it was not being dismissed and that it would be called back into session.

That led to speculation that there may be additional charges brought against lesser figures involved in the cover-up. There also was a possibility that the panel could ask Jaworski to subpoena 27 White House tapes related to the cover-up investigation that the President refused to hand over.

In other developments:

-The two other Watergate grand juries reportedly were close to returning charges in related investigations, including the activities of the White House plumbers; the ITT anti-trust probe; campaign contributions and campaign dirty tricks.

-David J. Williams, a Seattle attorney, has begun a campaign to raise a $150,000 legal defense fund for Ehrlichman. Williams and four other friends of Ehrlichman sent out a letter on Feb. 4, seeking donations.

In Mitchell, Stans trial

Ruling expected today on mistrial motion

NEW YORK (AP) - A judge is expected to rule today whether the criminal conspiracy case against former Atty. Gen John M. Mitchell and ex-Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans should be declared a mistrial.

A motion for a mistrial was made Friday after Asst. U.S. Attorney James W. Rayhill instructed jury members in his opening statement they should put themselves in the place of grand jurors who indicted the two ex-Cabinet officers.

The defense objected, contending the statement was prejudicial in that it implied the trial jurors should infer guilt from the indictment.

Actually, indictments are only accusations and not findings of guilt. It is up to the prosecutor to prove guilt in a case.

U.S. District Court Judge Lee P. Gagliardi said Rayhill's remarks contined "apparent excesses." He ordered the prosecutor and defense attorneys to file statements over the weekend on the mistrial motion.

Maurice Stans

Gagliardi suspended the historic trial and continued to sequester the jury of eight men and four women.

Announcement of last week's Watergate indictments in Washington had been held up until the jury was sequestered Thursday. Mitchell was named in one of those indictments.

Gagliardi had screened hundreds of persons over a period of a week before he found an impartial jury for the Mitchell-Stans trial. Speculation arose that should a mistrial be declared now, it would be near impossible to find a new impartial jury - especially after the Watergate indictment.

In that case the defense probably would move for dismissal of the charges or the prosecution might ask for a change of venue.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of trying to impede a Securities and Exchange Commission fraud investigation into the financial empire of Robert L. Vesco. In return, the government charged, they got a secret $200,000 contribution from Vesco to President Nixon's 1972 re-election campaign. The money was returned later.

John Mitchell

Mitchell and Stans were charged with conspiracy, obstruction of justice and perjury. They were the first former Cabinet members to be indicted on criminal charges since the 1923 Teapot Dome scandal.

The Watergate grand jury indicted Mitchell for the part he allegedly played in covering up the 1972 break-in and bugging of Democratic national headquarters in Washington. It also charged him with conspiracy, obstruction of justice and perjury.

Mitchell was director of Nixon's 1968 and 1972 presidential campaigns.

Congress to debate pay increase today

WASHINGTON (AP) - Congress comes to grips with a prickly political question this week - whether to allow a pay raise to go into effect that eventually would mean $10,300 a year more for each lawmaker.

The Senate is scheduled to begin debate today on altering or stopping the scheduled 7.5 per cent a year raise for three years for Congress, federal judges and higher officials of the executive branch.

Various alternatives are up for consideration, including postponing the raise for a year, substituting for it a one-time 5.5 per cent raise or killing it out-right. If Congress does nothing, the raise will go into effect.

On Tuesday, the Senate is scheduled to take up a bill that would raise the minimum wage, for most persons covered, from the present $1.60 an hour to $2 now and $2.20 in a year. It would also extend coverage to an estimated 7 million additional workers.

The bill is much like one President Nixon vetoed last year, but proponents hope that as finally drafted in conjunction with the House, it may win approval.

If Nixon vetoes the emergency energy bill, as he has said he will do, efforts may be made to override. If they fail, the House may take up a relatively minor bill to turn the energy office into a statutory agency and graft on to that legislation some aspects of the energy bill, such as standby authority for gasoline rationing.

Also scheduled for House debate later in the week is a bill to provide a voluntary, 10-year conversation to the metric system of weights and measures.

The Senate Finance Committee begins hearings Monday on the trade bill. The House passed it with a provision, opposed by the administration, denying trade advantages and credits to the Soviet Union unless it revises its policy impeding emigration of Jews and other minority groups. Treasury Secretary George P. Shultz is the first scheduled witness.

On Wednesday the House Banking Committee begins hearings on extension of wage-price control authority, scheduled to expire April 30. Shultz and Cost of Living Council Director John T. Dunlop are to be heard first.

The House also is scheduled to begin debate Wednesday on a measure designed to simplify registration for federal elections, providing a postcard form of registration application.

O'Neill sees Nixon's resignation imminent

PORTLAND, Maine (AP) - House Majority Leader Thomas P. O'Neill predicts President Nixon will soon resign.

The Massachusetts Democrat said in an interview Saturday that the President would step down to prevent the disclosure of information that the Watergate grand jury handed over to U.S. District Judge John Sirica.

"I just have the feeling that within the next six weeks, particularly if this evidence is turned over, that the President will resign," O'Neill said.

He said there has been considerable speculation in Washington about the grand jury's report concerning Nixon's role in the Watergate scandal.

"I just have the feeling that the President will conclude that the best way to get rid of this without it being turned over to the nation as a whole would be for him to resign," said O'Neill.

He said he presumed that Sirca would turn the material over to the House Judiciary Committee, where impeachment proceedings against tte President would originate.

Meeting with newsmen prior to his appearance at a reception for Maine Congressman Peter N. Kyros, O'Neill said that although he has yet to make up his own mind about Nixon's part in Watergate, it would be in the best interests of the nation for him to resign.

"The President had lost his credibility even before the action of the grand jury had taken place," he said "the public feeling toward the President is lower than it was before."

O'Neill said the indictments handed down by the Watergate grand jury came as no surprise.

McGilvray bigot

To The Editor:

I have been writing for this paper for three semesters now. I am disgusted, enraged, and confused. I think McGilvray has more than once shown himself to be an ignorant bigot. The two most obvious cases, of course, have been the Bromery cartoon of last week and earlier, a cartoon of two of his characters being confronted by a big ugly ballcrushing "Libber".

I have seen this paper, and by "this paper" I mean the editorial staff and all others who consider themselves a part of the press and have not spoken out against this, to be by association as bigoted and more irresponsible than McGilvray.

His image of Bromery as Kingfish was racist, was a kick in the teeth, and I ask you, Mr. Bromery, to please not let this die. I don't mean that you should take any kind of administrative action, but as an individual please don't dismiss this paper. As a feminist, I felt personally insulted by the earlier stereotype of the woman's "libber".

I am not only a member of the community that pays for this, but I am a member of the press that prints it. I have been considering the action of resignation, as a potitical act, because I have lost all respect for the editors of this paper, and I feel that as long, as I am part of the staff my reputation is in danger. But I will not resign. Instead, I will ask all self-respecting blacks and feminists to take over this paper. I am not suggesting a violent, revolutionary act. This paper is run by anyone who has the energy to get into it. I am asking the people in the Afro-Am. Studies to please get on this staff and affect policy. I am asking all feminists to do the same. I feel my voice is in the minority here, I feel this very strongly, and if definite action is taken, if people radical enough to believe in black and womanly dignity will get active here now, next February we can elect a black and feminist board of editors.

I cannot remain silently associated with this paper as it is now, but to simply resign would be a form of surrender. All appearances of friendship I may have shown to McGilvray may hereby be disregarded, I am ashamed to consider him and anyone who would protect him a colleague.

Denny Matteau

Collegian biased

To the Editor:

"The Collegian exercises this prerogative (to insure a responsible press) daily in deciding which 'Letters To The Editor' are to be accepted and which rejected. Foolish and senseless letters tend not to be printed." So says Menachen Rosenburger (2-28). I would regret very deeply if he or any of you readers believe that this is the only thing that would keep an unsolicited letter from being printed. There are two reasons. The first is space. What goes into that space is the second, and this is the question I write about in this letter.

The space alloted for editorial comment is subject to what is called in news circles as "Editorial Standpoint." A free and responsible press has an editorial standpoint of being free and responsible, and only that. I therefore accuse the Collegian of self-vesting itself with an added pro-abortion standpoint.

In Thursday's Collegian was the second in a series, I suppose, of a "write to your congressmen" letter, which had a focus on persuading people to write their congressmen to save a woman's choice to abort. A week ago I personally delivered a rebuttal of the first letter to the Collegian office. This letter was not silly, foolish, nor senseless. But it was in the spirit of life for life's sake, rather than for the sake of the almighty dollar society. It was not printed. I am sure the Collegian could have found some space for that letter since that time, but now I realize that space is not the problem — it is the self-vested editorial standpoint of this supposed free and responsible forum which prevented my letter from being printed.

I think that the Collegian can at least have the courtesy to return my letter to me. The Boston Globe and the New York Times do that much, and I don't even pay for them with my student fees.

Council not dead

To The Editor:

Misinformation seems to be the name of the game on this campus. The research and printing of facts seems to have gone all the way of South Hadley's dinosaurs. Two writers and a cartoonist who appeared in the March 1, 1974, publications of the Collegian and Below the Salt would have served the interests of the UMass community better if they had delayed the printing of their material until April 1st.

Don McGilvray of late must be too busy drawing sometimes-funny, sometimes-tasteless cartoons to have paid his semester bill; either that, Don, or you were taken and the computer owes you eight dollars. Your Campus Center fee for the semester was twenty-six dollars, and for the year fifty-two dollars. But maybe cartoonists don't have to deal with facts, if not, then they are a real joke.

Gary Gomes, the first writer in the Below the Salt publication (p. 5), with whom I take exception, apparently has a long way to go in becoming a journalist. He talks about the "demise of the Program Council," "weeping for your bucks," and if you "wanna find out how the Board of Governors works" to read on to Noel Conley's article. I'd like to extend to you a personal invitation to come up to the BOG office and find out what really is going on there. Valid and factual information which can be gathered there might turn you into a better journalist, Gary Gomes.

As for Noel Conley and his article (same publication, same page) it consisted of 98 per cent fiction and 2 per cent fact. I find it extremely painful to say that he is a member of the BOG; but don't blame me, he represents and is the appointment of the Southwest Area Government. I find it hard to believe that out of a constituency of 5,000 a more capable and responsible individual could not be found. Is that really true Southwest?

For the sake of brevity, I shall try to clarify only his major misconceptions. Program Council is not dead, and the officers of the BOG are not involved in a graduate student "conspiracy." There is a reorganization proposal kicking around, formulated by and being discussed with both undergraduate and graduate senate leaders. Consideration of such proposals is a normal and necessary part of the student governmental process. No plan will be finalized except through the usual channels, i.e., the majority approval of UMass student representatives.

Last year there was no legislation proposed by any graduate student member of the BOG to transfer Student Activities - RSO (Recognized Student Organizations) funding over to the undergraduate senate. It was a proposal by the undergraduate senate to the graduate senate and the BOG, which proposal the latter parties accepted. Got that, Noel? It was your undergraduate government which initiated the transfer last year.

As to graduate students paying their fair share — the approximately 3,600 graduate students pay the same Campus Center fee as undergraduates and their representation on the Board is in direct proportion to this number of fee-paying students (four graduate students on a 21 member body.) As a graduate student elected a Board officer by the undergraduate majority of the Board, I am honored by their faith in me. My constituency became, by the process of that election, 23,000 students, both undergraduate and graduate.

I've spent a year and a half on this campus fighting taxation without representation on behalf of both the graduate and undergraduate population. I've won most of my battles and lost some others; what I don't like are half-truths and untruths presented to the UMass community by people who should know better as if they are "telling it like it is." The BOG office in room 817 of the CC is not so far from the Collegian office that factual news can not be obtained. I would welcome with open arms any and all persons in the community who would like to find out what is going on; we need help, advice, counsel, and support in room 817 of the Campus Center. I hope to see you there.

Sincerely yours,
James A. Lindsey

Chinese power

To The Editor:

On March 4, 1880, Governor George Perkins of California proclaimed the day a legal holiday for anti-Chinese demonstrations throughout the state. This is typical of the hostile feelings shown by the whites toward the Chinese at that time. Then in 1882, Congress passed the first Chinese Exclusion Act prohibiting Chinese immigrants from coming into the U.S. This act and its amendments stayed in effect for sixty-one years until 1943.

The majority of people in this country do not know what it was like to be Chinese and in the U.S. during that period. According to law, no Chinese could testify against a white person in a court of law. Therefore, beating the Chinese was considered a legitimate form of amusement for whites. There were mob lynchings, women raped, dogs set on little children, and countless other untold murders. "Special hospitals" for Chinese people had their windows constantly being broken by people throwing rocks and bricks through them. The patients, themselves, were victims of stonings as they entered the hospital.

Hundreds of women were shipped from China into this country unaware that they were to be used as prostitutes. Chinese workers were used to break strikes at the miserable salary of $3.00 per month for a sixteen hour work day.

The Chinese have had to withstand racial discrimination and open prejudice ever since they stepped foot on this country of Liberty, Freedom, and Equality. Nothing has changed, even today. The Chinese are tolerated like all the other minorities. The Asian-American students must unite and act together to preserve our cultural heritage and maintain our human dignity. Be proud.

Fee protested

To The Editor:

I would just like to express my opinion about the Project Self course registration preceedings. When I went to sign up for a course, I was told it would cost $18. I assumed it was to pay for the teacher teaching it. I was not told there was a non-refundable registration fee for all courses.

Upon hearing it was $18, I stated I could not afford it and started to leave. I was then told I could be put on scholarship and would only have to pay $5. I then thought I was being subsidized. I was again not told this was a registration fee. I was then asked for the money and paid, assuming if I could not take the course (of which I was in doubt) I could always get the money back.

As it turns out, I decided not to take the course and when I went back to get my money I was told then that it was a none-refundable registration fee. I told them I was not given that information when I paid, that I needed that money. I was told it was impossible. I left. But the more I thought about it, the more I thought, "Why should I suffer for a mistake or misconception for which I was not to blame?" If I had been told this money was not returnable, I wouldn't have paid it. I blame no one. I just think that I was treated unfairly, and because of the mistake I feel I should get that money back. I'm sorry to make such a big deal over this, but I am very tight for money and $5 is an awful lot when you don't have that much.

In the future, I would also advise you to inform people about the rule of a non-refundable $5 registration fee to prevent this type of thing happening again.

Leobphobia

To The Editor:

I have often thought that those individuals who are afraid, nervous, or uneasy around homosexuals, are individuals who are uncertain about their own sexual identity. Individuals who persecute and torment Gay people, must be the ones most searching for their own sexual identity. It seems to me that if one is positive about their sexual orientation, any other person's sexual preference would be of little circumstance.

It is very interesting to note Mr. Loebs crusade against the Gay students at U.NH. This man would be as Dr. George Wienberg (Author of Society and the Healthy Homosexual) called a "Homophobe", an individual who has an extreme phobia about homosexuals. Dr. Wienberg goes on to state that he would never consider a patient healthy, until this phobia was gone. It is also interesting that this is not the first time Mr. Loeb's phobia has been aroused. He has written editorials in the Hartford Currant against the "sick" Gay organizations in Conn. area; often quoting God in his attacks, I have wondered if he had a hot line.

It seems to me, that Mr. Loeb is a very frightened, and insecure individual, who would attack any group, if that attack would ease his own fears, or justify his own existence.

Artist needed

To The Editor:

All people who applied for the position of Artist-in-residence for The Central Crafts Center

We are very happy to have received all of your applications for the Artist-in-Residence position. But we can't get in touch with some of those who've applied.

The Central Area Crafts Center is holding interviews for the jobs starting this weekend on Sunday, March 3rd, and again on Tuesday, March 5th. If you have submitted an application, please contact Pam in 318 Greenough, 545-2643, or Mark at 546-4774. This position means a great deal to the organization of the Crafts Shop, so reply and let us give you some consideration. It might be our gain....

Editor apologizes

Editors Note:

A letter to the editor in Friday's edition headlined "Uglies who need uglies" was signed Vincent D. Galli and Mark W. Ginsburg. They were not the real signators. And we don't know who sent the letter. We apologize to Mssrs. Ginsburg and Galli.

There will be a meeting of ALL Collegian Commentators tonight at 7:00 p.m. in the editorial office.

A matter of life

It's Gun Control time again. It seems that about this time last year I was in the same boat, trying to convince a few people that non-gun owners have some rights too. But did you ever try to reason with a gun owner? Ever quote statistics from countries that do have gun restrictions? Or what about percentages of murders by hand guns in this country, or accidental shooting deaths, or serious woundings? If you have, then you've probably heard the same old arguments. "People kill people, not guns!" That's a classic. It's like saying that people fly, not airplanes. It seems to me that if we banned airplanes there'd be a hell of a lot fewer people flying these days, in the conventional sense anyway. The human and the machine are relatively inseperable in each case. If there's a plane around, then you might consider taking a flight. If there's a gun around, they you might consider taking a shot. I mean, that's what they're around for, isn't it?

But society is rediculous. They swamp you with ads about cigarette smoking being the worst thing since Grant took Richmond, and yet there isn't a single TV commercial in sight concerning the hazards of handguns. I must day hand guns, of course, since I wouldn't want my "sportsman" friends to burn their hunting caps in disgust. If they want to step out on a sunny afternoon, and destroy wildlife, and call it a sport, then that's their business. But I somehow doubt like hell that they'd be waiting behind that tree, if the deer was equipped with a rifle to shoot back with! But that's another matter altogether, and not to be confused. Hunt on, brave souls.

Sorry about that. If it's your bag, fine. But why are all the hunters against slapping some restrictions on hand gun owners? They're obviously scared to death that someone is going to take away their rifles. Well have no fear, with the National Rifle Association protecting the, there's not a chance anything will ever happen to their rifles. But the smartest thing that the NRA, and the hunters alike, could do is support hand gun restrictions. It would certainly dramatize the difference between them and the guy who keeps a loaded .38 in his closet. And it would prevent that guy trom hiding under the cloak of the weekend hunter.

Is gun control going to stop murder? I can just imagine if a law restricting handguns were passed, and the first reported shooting death came out in the papers. They'd be a line of "I told you so's" from here to Dallas. No, damnit, it's not going to stop murder. It'll do what it's done every place else it's been tried: reduce the frequency of killing in general, accidental as well; drastically reduce the incidence of death by hand gun; and give society a new sense of sanity. It would also make law enforcement a hell of a lot easier.

"If a criminal wants a gun, he'll get one." That's a beauty too. I guess a guy first becomes a criminal, and then sits around and says "Hey, I'm a criminal, so I need a gun." What about the guy today who can walk into a store, pick up a gun, and keep it just in case he ever decides that he'd like to become a criminal? Sound far fetched? Sure, but I seriously wonder if possession of a hand gun in the first place makes a lot of people contemplate things, and do things, that they never would have otherwise, and I don't think that's so far fetched!

So here I go again, making the same arguments to the same ears. But I figure, what the hell. If gun owners can swamp the State House year after year, and if the NRA can lobby in Washington, putting pressure on Congressmen, then I can write a column about it. And I'll probably get the same letters from the same people as last time. And they'll all contain inuendos, and references to their rights, and to hell with mine. But that's OK, maybe a few of you will send in some friendly letters this time. So to answer the usual questions I'll just say: yes, I've fired a gun. Yes, I've carried a gun. Yes, like a great many others, I've seen what guns can do to people, on both sides of the trigger. And no, I don't want to see any more. It's not a matter of rights at all, it's simply a matter of life.

I rode a train once

In a song lamenting its passing, Arlo Guthrie called it our "father's magic carpet made of steel." Though it's still made of steel, the passenger train has lost those "magic carpet" qualities and exists as the Prohibition Party of transportation, something remembered by many, experienced by few.

Once it was to a nation what the automobile is to the individual. Besides being a means of travel it was a national virility symbol. Our trains were bigger, and faster, and better-built, as we like to think our cars are.

Its demise is a shame. In a country which has made travel the fourth necessity of life, there is no better way to go.

Perhaps its relaxed pace and plebian atmosphere are to un-American. What's a trip without a movie or hand-to-foot service. Why ride when you can drive and release your hostilities upon that SOB in front of you who didn't use his signal?

It is an education. You can tell what a house is really like by its backyard. The junk that goes with living ends up back there, and what it is and how it's kept tells lots about those on the inside.

The train doesn't see the neon, artificial green and fresh paint of the Interstate; it goes by the stonewall in the back and steps right over the mushy spot where the cesspool overflows.

The backyard that it sees isn't very pretty. Rivers, alternately green and brown, dumps, junkyards, scrap heaps filled with the residue from the junkyards and dumps, and thousands upon thousands of beer cans are evidently the major forces in American life.

Whatever, the forces in American life have led the country into a crisis that can't be solved by their personal four-wheeled virility symbols.

It must look elsewhere to get where it must go. The thumb, the bus, the bicycle. Boats, planes, feet. And trains. Like the 40-year-old slugger who has hit .235 for the last five seasons and is up with the bases loaded and two outs in the seventh game of the World Series, the train is being asked to call on its better days just one final time. One time for the team.

It'll come through, and help with a crisis (now only a "problem") that some day will be over. And then the train will return to being an anachronism; a remnant of a simpler time when fosseilized sea microorganisms did't run our lives.

Too old to swing a bat, its usefullness served, it will be no more. Fathers will drive by rusted racks in their Wankel-engined economy Cadillacs, turn towards the kids in the back seat and say, "Yeah, I rode in a train once."..

Out of gas

Winos, revolt!!

"In the souls of the people the grapes of wrath are filling and growing heavy for the vintage."

By BILL PARENT

The battle rages on between the migrant farm workers and the Teamsters still, thirty-five years later. In the past two months, the hardships of these people have been magnified.

In Blythe, California on January 15th, a bus carrying migrant workers 100 miles to the fields plunged into an unmarked irrigation ditch. Nineteen men were killed and twenty-eight others were injured. When a second bus came down the road fifteen munutes later, the driver of that bus would not pull over and allow the other workers to help. They had to force him to a stop a mile down the road. The owner of the buses, Jesus Ayala, refused to take responsibility for the poor conditions and the overcrowding of the buses.

In Florida, two windowless van trucks which contractors commonly use to herd the workers to the fields overturned, killing one man and injuring one hundred others.

Throughout history, people have been poor and uneducated but the tragedy occurs when those people are surrounded, controlled and bled by the affluence around them. Last year, as migrant workers continued to live in shabby mobile homes and unsanitary camps, Ronald Reagan and Richard Nixon sat at a political dinner and ate grapes and lettuce for all to see.

What can be done?

First of all, we can stop drinking those cheap Gallo wines on Friday nights. Included are "Boones Farm," "Spanada," "Tyrolia," "Ripple" and anything else bottled in Modesto or Rippon California. A poll of local package stores revealed that lately, a very popular wine in this area is Hearty Burgundy — this too should be boycotted.

Steve Rowley of the local Juan De La Cruz Boycott Committee says. "It's one thing that can really affect students, we don't eat that much lettuce but we drink all the time."

Boycotting has paid off too. Because somebody cared, the lettuce in the dining commons is UFW lettuce, Stop & Shop and the Peoples Market now sell eastern lettuce from Florida and Finast finally made an agreement not to sell Teamster lettuce.

Something must be done. The average lifespan of a farmworker is 49 years, education is unheard of, the infant mortality rate is twice as high as the national average and disease is rampant in the camps where there is no plumbing.

Last year, Ceasar Chavez and a large group of farmworkers came to Boston. There was a march through the city and a rally in front of the A&P building. Afterwards they gathered in the basement of the Paulist Center where the young women were laughing, dancing and singing the songs of liberation while the dark skinned, short, muscular ment sat smoking cigarettes and talking rapid Spanish. Chavez and Huertas looked fatigued but continued to shake hands, answer questions and smile.

I asked one of the men what he thought of the long trip from California.

"I did not come for me," he said through a thick Chicano accent, "I came here for my children and my people so that they may lead better lives."

These Farmworkers are strong people but they need support. Don't buy Gallo, Guild or Franzia wines or lettuce or grapes without the UFW-AZTEC symbol. There are many alternatives and the cause is just.

For the people

By MARK VOGLER

The plight of the mentally retarded at Belchertown State School - a major issue in the 2nd Hampshire County House seats two years ago -seems destined for the platform of this year's gubernatorial candidates.

That is the way House Speaker David Bartley sees things.

"Unquestionably Belchertown State School should be an issue of the '74 campaign," Bartley (D-Holyoke) said this week.

"How much of an issue it will be, I really don't know. But certainly the fact that it took court action to bring change reflects rather badly on the Sargent administration and gives us something to think about."

Commentary: Whether or not candidates Carroll Sheehan (R), Michael Dukakis (D), Attorney Gen. Robert Quinn or Gov. Francis Sargent wish to avoid the state school issue, the choice now seems beyond their control.

"Unquestionably Belchertown State School should be an issue of the '74 campaign."

Dr. Benjamin Ricci, President of the Belchertown State School Friends Ass'n., said he will make it an issue.

Two years ago,when the Friends' suit was filed, it was Ricci who arranged for the four candidates running for the two House seats in the 2nd Hampshire County to tour the institution.

Ricci has already extended the same invitation to this year's gubernatorial contenders. So far, only Dukakis has agreed to come.

"If they don't come, they obviously don't want to come...it would just indicate that they want to dodge this important issue," Ricci said.

"But...this has been an issue right along. When citizens have to go to court to get some kind of relief, then anyone running for the office of governor ought to come and see what's wrong."

COLLEGE DEMOCRATS of MASS. (C.DM.) announces its second local meeting, to be held tomorrow night (Tues.) at 8 p.m. in room 105 of the UMass Campus Center.

The local chapter - Five College Democrats - will discuss plans for organization and recruitment. The membership goal is set at 300 by April 1.

At the meeting, methods for publicizing the "People's Caucus", to be held March 25, will be outlined.

C.D.M. is conducting its own public caucus in early April. At that caucus, participants will nominate candidates for Governor and Attorney General.

Gun control

Taking sight

By BOB MAC KAY

"A well regulated Militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms shall not be infringed."

Does the second amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantee each citizen with the right to own a firearm? If so, then any state or Federal form of gun control is unconstitutional.

Yet, proponents of gun control argue that the second amendment was not directed to the individual citizen's right. Rather, they say that the amendment was meant solely to maintain the state's right to organize and arm a militia. Supreme Court decisions appear to support this contention.

In U.S. vs. Miller (1939) the Supreme Court ruled that they could:

"not take judicial notice that a gun having a barrel less than 18 inches long has today any reasonable relation to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia and therefore cannot say that the second amendment guarantees to the citizen the right to keep and bear such a weapon."

In U.S. vs. Tot (1942) the court ruled that:

"weapon bearing was never treated as anything like an absolute right by common law" and declared that the second amendment "was not adopted with individual rights in mind, but as a protection for the States in the maintenance of their militia organizations against possible encroachments by the Federal power.

Advocates of gun control often cite various reports and statistics to support their stand. For example, Sen. Jack H. Backman (D-Brookline) has said that "The FBI Uniform Crime Reports of 1972 show that 70 per cent of all homicides were committed without felonious motive by an assailant who knew the victim. (a crime of passion;"

Backman also testified at last week's State House gun connrol hearing that 70 per cent of all homicides are crimes of passion, and that one-half of all homicides are committed with handguns. Still, these figures do not directly say how many crimes of passion are committed with handguns.

Also, the Brookline legislator said that, "...In 1973, of all murders in Boston, 70 were committed with handguns as opposed to ten for rifles and shotguns combined." But what Backman didn't say as that all of these 70 handguns were illegal - they had either been stolen or never registered.

In fact, at the hearing anti-handgun bill spokesmen were able to show that some of the statistics used by gun control proponents were incomplete or misleading. At the same time, though, the hearing itself was misleading. Gardner Auditorium was filled by almost 1100 people. Close to 1000 of them wore "Stick to Your Guns" tags.

Many of these "Stick to Your Guns" people were inexcusably rude to those speaking for handgun legislation. They expecially booed Gov. Sargent, Sen. Backman, Sheriff John Buckley, and Boston Police Commissioner Robert diGrazia.

This year's Legislative Session includes some thirty bills dealing with handgun control. Testimony both for and against the bills was heard by the Committee on Public Safety. Still, many citizens do not realize that Mass. has some of the strictest gun control laws in the nation. But these laws are not seriously enforced.

Closing comments: There is definite justification for additional handgun control. But, more laws will be useless if they are not enforced - and state laws can easily be avoided by crossing state lines. Also, such people as the sportsmen must be considered when discussing additional gun control.

Finally, vested interests have aired their thoughts concerning gun control. The public as a whole has not. For that reason, the question of handgun legislation should be decided on a referendum question in this November's general election.

Sen. Jack H. Backman

Many of these "Stick to Your Guns" people were inexcusably rude to those speaking for handgun legislation. They especially booed Gov. Sargent, Sen. Backman, Sheriff John Buckley, and Boston Police Commissioner Robert diGrazia.

Olver speaks on energy hearings

Senator John W. Olver (D-Amherst) is urging consumers to write to the Department of Public Utilities and Gov. Sargent protesting rate increases that have been requested by Mass. Electric and Western Mass. Electric. The D.P.U. has scheduled hearings on the proposed rate increases.

"If possible," Sen. Olver said, "customers should try and attend the hearing for the utility which serves them, otherwise they should write."

The Mass. Electric hearing is today (Mon.) at 2 p.m. in the Leverett Saltonstall Building in Boston. Mass. Electric is seeking a $24.6M increase, claiming increased fuel costs and decreased use of electricity make the increase necessary. They have received $7M increases in each of the two preceding years.

Sen. John W. Olver

The Western Mass. Electric hearing will be on March 19th, also in the Saltonstall Building at 10 a.m. Western Mass. is seeking an $11.2M increase. In the past three years they have sought increases totalling $22.3M; decisions on the bulk of these requests are still pending.

Sen. Olver said he plans to attend both hearings. He added, "I will be happy to provide additional information about utility bills. Anyone with questions is welcome to write or call my office: Room 217 at the State House, telephone 617-727-8832."

No. 1 line????

Marijuana - Soon legal?

Legislation is pending that would remove all penalties for the possession or non-profit transfer of an ounce or less of marijuana.

The Mass. Social Welfare Committee heard testimony last Thursday on Senate bill 299, sponsored by Sen. Jack H. Backman of Brookline. The measure would virtually make an ounce or less of grass legal - provided that the drug wasn't being sold for profit.

Sen. Backman says that he expects the Committee to issue a favorable report on the bill. Other measures involving the decriminilization of marijuana are also being considered by the Committee-and will probably be reported out favorably. But whether or not the bills go through the Legislature is an entirely different question.

Heath ponders resignation dilema

By FRED COLEMAN
Associated Press Writer

LONDON (AP) - Prime Minister Edward Heath called in key members of his cabinet Sunday night amid speculation that the resignation of his Conservative government may be imminent.

At the same time Harold Wilson, leader of the opposition Labor party which won the most parliamentary seats in last Thursday's general election but fell short of a majority, returned to London from his farm west of the capital, setting the scene for a possible change of power.

With Heath were Conservative party chairman Lord Carrington, Foreign Secretary Alec Douglas-Home, Chancellor of the Exchequer Anthony Barber and other senior ministers.

A source close to Heath refused to speculate on whether a "definitive decision" was possible Sunday night. The source stressed that Heath had been consulting with cabinet members since Friday.

The general expectation, he said, was that no decision would be taken until after the Liberal party, which has the potential balance of power in the new Parliament, holds a caucus Monday.

Earlier, sources in Heath's party aid the prime minister was likely to resign by Wednesday unless he can form a government with the help of smaller parties.

His chances of climbing to office appeared slim as the British press, striking coal miners and other trade unions began a "Heath Must Go" campagin. Four out of the seven British national newspapers said in Sunday editorials that Heath should quit.

The prime minister called last Thursday's elections to seek an increased mandate of tough measures to resolve what he called Britain's worst economic crisis since World War II. Instead the virtually dead-locked result created the country's worst political crisis since the war.

Heath lost his 15-vote majority in the old parliament and no party won the 318 places needed for a majority in the new 635-seat House of Commons. The results gave Harold Wilson's opposition Labor party 301 seats, Heath's Conservatives 296, Jeremy Thorpe's moderate Liberals 14 and others - mostly nationalists from Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland - a total of 24 seats.

Although the Conservatives finished second in terms of parliamentary seats, they won the largest popular vote -11.8 million to 11.6 million for Labor. Heath used this to justify attempts to try and stay in office.

The prime minister faces two immediate problems. He must have assurances from other parties that would give him a majority in Parliament. And he must be able to settle quickly the national strike by coal miners that threatens to choke off coal-fueled electricity supplies later this month and halt industry. His prospects on both counts appeared poor.

Heath called in Thorpe Saturday and offered the Liberal leader a place in the cabinet in return for parliamentary support. The 14 Liberals, divided on whether they should join the conservatives, meet Monday to decide. Heath would need all Liberal votes plus some from Scottish nationalists and Northern Ireland Unionists if he is to retain power. On the basis of public statements from minor parties so far, he is unlikely to get enough support.

Hearsts see soon release

By JACK SCHREIBMAN
Associated Press Writer

HILLSBOROUGH, Calif. (AP) — Tired and taut from a 28-day vigil, the parents of kidnaped newspaper heiress Patricia Hearst pleaded Sunday for word from her and said they believe she soon will be free.

"You've never harmed anybody, and I know that pretty soon God will touch their hearts and they'll send you home again," said Miss Hearst's mother, Catherine.

"We might add to the people who are holding you that you could be allowed to send us a letter or get in touch with us by tape," said her father, Randolph A. Hearst, editor and president of the San Francisco Examiner.

The Symbionese Liberation Army claims it kidnaped the 20-year-old coed Feb. 4 from her Berkeley apartment and is holding her as a "prisoner of war" under the international rules of the Geneva Convention.

"Patty, we kind of missed you on your birthday, Feb. 20. We thought maybe you'd be home then, but I think you'll be home pretty soon," Hearst said.

"I'm sure she is all right. I believe she is being held under the Geneva Convention. We just would like to say hello to her," said Hearst, who appeared with his wife on the steps of his here and pleaded with the terrorist captors to break a 10-day silence.

"Patty, honey, your father is doing everything in his power and I want you to know that millions of people all over the world are praying for you," said Mrs. Hearst.

"I know it's a long time, sweetheart, and you keep up your courage. We'll keep praying."

The kidnapers, in the first of three communications issued since Miss Hearst was abducted, demanded a food giveaway program estimated to cost up to $400 million. They said the program was to be a good faith gesture on Hearst's part.

Campaign funding already started

By H. L. SCHWARTZ III
Assoicated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congressional elections are eight months away, but many of the senators seeking votes already have started campaigning — for contributions to build up their political treasuries.

Six senators reported contributions of more than $200,000 apiece as the election year began. Nine senators had collected a total of more than $2.1 million, according to reports filed with the secretary of the Senate.

Most of the money came in small contributions.

However, in some cases, there were big donations from people with actual or potential interests in legislation, or from organizations under federal investigation.

Thirty-four Senate seats will be at stake in the November balloting, but six members have announced retirement, leaving a maximum of 28 incumbents to campaign for new terms.

Sen. Alan Cranston, D-Calif., and Sen. Richard Schweiker, R-Pa., were the leading early fund-raisers.

Cranston raised $338,100 in cash last year, more than half of it between September and December. He also reported $88,000 in pledges.

Schweiker reported raising $339,165 in cash.

Other senators topping $200,000 were Democrats Adlai E. Stevenson III of Illinois, $280,374; Daniel K. Inouye of Hawaii, $270,473; and Thomas F. Eagleton of Missouri,$236,520; and Republican Robert Dole of Kansas, $273,438.

Most of these senators raised the bulk of their contributions through fund-rasing dinners. But several also had large individual contributors.

Inouye, for instance, received $20,000 from four executives of the Page Aircraft of Rochester, N.Y. Inouye is chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee's aviation subcommittee.

Page executives also contributed $10,000 to Sen. Ernest F. Hollings, S-S.C., another member of the aviation subcommittee.

Inouye reported two $5,000 contributions made from Washington lawyer William F. Ragan, whose firm represents Sea-Land Service Inc. of Elizabeth, N.J.

Inouye also reported a $5,000 contribution from George M. Steinbrenner III, president of American Shipbuilding Co., which is under investigation for allegedly making an illegal corporate contribution to President Nixon's re-election campaign.

Inouye aides say the senator and Steinbrenner are old feiends and assurances had been received Steinbrenner's check was from personal funds.

Two other senators received contributions from dairy cooperative political committees, involved in federal investigations stemming from the so-called milk fund affair. That case grew out of contributions and pledges to President Nixon's re-election campaign prior to a 1971 administration decision to increase federal milk price supports.

Dole received a total of $15,000 from three of the dairy copperatives, but said he is returning the money.

Stevenson got one $5,000 contribution which an aide said was returned. But the senator decided to keep $1,500 with which one of the dairy committes purchased tickets to a Stevenson fund-raising dinner last October.

The same milk cooperative committees contributed $10,000 to Sen. Herman Talmadge, D-Ga. Talmadge is a member of the Senate Watergate Committee, one of the bodies investigating dairy contributions to Nixon. A Talmadge aide said the senator does not plan to return the money.

Bellmon raised $122,642 in one day of fund raising with the help of former Secretary of the Treasury John B. Connally. Much of it came as $1,000 contributions from Oklahoma oilmen.

Vermont's land plan sick

BOSTON (AP) — The land use plan proposed for the state of Vermont looks like "one of the remnants of the Battle of Bastogne," Vermont Gov. Thomas P. Salmon said Saturday.

And he placed the blame for the destruction of the plan squarely on the shoulders of the state legislature.

The governor was the principal speaker at a day long conference on state land use planning being held in Boston for the New England region.

"In the name of local autonomy, the state's role in flood plain and shoreline zoning has withered under legislative heat," Salmon said.

He added that members of the legislature were "behaving in a decidedly unfriendly manner toward several items of critical environmental legislation now before them."

The governor said he was disheartened by developments in his own state but "it's a political year," he added.

"It's a year poisoned by events in Washington, which seem to prompt legislators to keep their heads down, do as little as possible and get out of the limelight quickly," he said.

It is also a year of regression in the area of environmental affairs, Salmon said, with the energy crisis providing a convenient "if irrelevent excuse."

He said Vermont is a poor state and "needs economic growth desperately. But we will have it on our terms," he said.

Comm. urged to okay marijuana

BOSTON (AP) - A legislative committee was urged last week to reduce or eliminate penalties for private use of marijuana.

Rep. Michael F. Flaherty, D-Boston, House chairman of the Social Welfare Committee admitted he had tried marijuana.

Lester Grinspoon, director of research in psychiatry at Massachusetts Mental Health Center, was interrupted by Rep. William Saltzman, I-New Bedford, who wanted to know if Grinspoon had tried marijuana.

Flaherty interrupted, "that's not the issue here today, for that matter I've tried it, inside, outside, up above and down below."

Later he clarified himself, saying he did not want to read "Flaherty is a pothead" in the newspapers.

"I tried it as an experiment, and I didn't get anything out of it. There were those present who will remember that I pretended I did," he said.

Grinspoon said he had tried marijuana and found it pleasant, but added, "I wouldn't go out of my way for it." Saltzman said "I stuck with alcohol for 50 years and I'm not ashamed of it."

Dr. Matthew Dumont, director of the Division of Drug Rehabilitation, said in support of the bills in question that would remove either all or most criminal penalties for marijuana violations, "We have branded half our high school students as outlaws. Our marijuana laws are among the most harmful we have. We have made hotshot lawyers rich."

Grinspoon said there was no evidence that marijuana was harmful to any human tissue. "It is not harmless," he said, "but its harmfulness must be put in perspective with the harm caused by the laws."

Robert Glass, former counsel to the Boston Police Department who spoke for the state Bar Association at the hearing, said the bills decriminalizing use and possession should be redrafted. The legislation should permit police to use their discretion in making arrests for possession with intent to sell, he said.

Poetry in translation

The five colleges are sponsoring a symposium on poetry in translation, today through Wednesday, here and at Hampshire College.

There will be an opening lecture today by Jonathan Griffin at 7:30 in room 106, Thompson Hall. Tuesday afternoon, a workshop will be held in room 113 of the Campus Center, from 2:30 to 5:00. Guest speakers will be Peter Viereck, Frederick Will, Christopher Collins, Michael Benedikt, Jonathan Griffin, and William Moebius, will read poems written in translation.

Wednesday, the symposium moves to Hampshire College's West Lecture Hall where Stanley Kunits, Jon Griffin, and Judith Thurman will read papers and lead discussions from 2:30 till 5:00. Again, that night, there will be a poetry reading beginning at 7:30 with Stanley Kunitz, Jonathan Griffin, Judith Thurman, Michael Benedikt, and Hampshire's own Lawrence Pitkethly.

Commuter Elections

Commuter elections held Feb 27 and 28 resulted in the following elections to the Commuter Assembly Executive Council: Lawrence Gendron, Thomas Doherty, Keith Gustartis, Joseph Beals, Martha Esquivel, Paul Sliwa, Karen Mangan.

The referendum pertaining to allocation of funds to the Outreach Service of the Transit System was voted YES by an overwhelming majority.

All new members of the Commuter Assembly Executive Council should attend the orientation meeting Wednesday at 12:30 in the Commuter Lounge. A time for regular scheduled meetings will be decided at that time.

Ron Burton speech

Ronald Burton will be the featured speaker at the S.U.B. tonight at 7:30 pm. As a candidate for the office of Secretary of State, Burton will be discussing his platform in terms of personal goals, and party policies in retrospect to Watergate.

"Fairness" group for Nixon defends his "virtues"

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - A zealous staff working out of a crowded four-room office has raised nearly a half-million dollars to wage a nationwide publicity campaign defending President Nixon against Watergate scandals and other charges.

Seven months after its formation, the National Citizens Committee for Fairness to the Presidency has grown from 18 charter members to a network of about 200 chapters claiming more than 200,000 members.

"I truly want to see thousands of groups," defending the President, says the Rabbi Baruch Korff, who put his career in limbo and donated his vacation savings to formation of the committee.

Through newspaper advertisements, petitions, matchbook ads and public appearances, the rabbi and his committee are spreading their message: the news media and scheming politicians have found Nixon guilty on all charges and are dedicated to driving him out of office.

By contrast, Korff characterizes Nixon as one of the greatest presidents in the nation's history. "What rattles the liberals and the radicals," he says, "are not his vices, but his virtues. He has accomplished everything that eluded his predecessors of the liberal vintage."

The committee's fans include the President himself and his family. After the Korff appeared on a recent segment of NBC's "Today" show, he received a telegram from Pat Nixon and Julie Eisenhower saying, "We have just watched your appearance on the Today show. You were tremendous and have our great admiration."

Nixon has sent Korff two notes of appreciation and met with him privately last December. The President also has consented to appear as the guest of honor Feb. 22 at a luncheon tribute sponsored in Washington by the committee.

Korff, a 72nd generation rabbi who works without pay, presides over a staff of eight paid workers and 200 volunteers who demonstrate unwaivering support to the President. The office's administrative assistant, Miss Elizabeth Mudge, took a leave of absence from a job in public relations to join the campaign on a volunteer basis. At the same time, she makes financial contributions to the committee.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Pisces is drawn to the theater, to acting, to a "let's pretend" atmosphere. Pisces is sensitive and can create moods and, at times, interpret them.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You become more aware of basic issues. Home, family, property and security are highlighted. You are slowed by those who insist on assurances, collateral. This may be ultimatley to your good — you get emotional second wind. Don't panic. Progress will resume.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Accent is on putting ideas into motion. Short journey is on agenda. You make contacts, express thoughts and study special articles. Fine for writing, advertising, submitting concepts, formats and suggestions. You may not immediately strike mark, but you do get lay of land.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Emphasize details in connection with money, valuables, personal possessions. Check insurance. Get appraisal. Find out where you stand, who owns what and what you can do about it. Aquarius, Leo, Scorpio individuals could be involved.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Lunar cycle is high; take initiative. Accent original ideas, independence. Personal magnetism soars. You attract opposite sex. Be ready for involvement. Protect yourself. Don't give up something for nothing. Special message contains favorable news.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Maintain low profile. Be discreet. Make peace at home. One who badgered you in recent past is ready to offer apology. Be a gracious winner. If mature, you gain. Taurus, Libra persons are in picture. You discover that your fears are groundless. Be quiet within.

VIRGO (AUG. 23-Sept. 22): Promises should be defined. Not wise now to take situation, individuals for granted. Element of deception, intentional or otherwise, is present. Opportunity for advancement is available — but get instructions, intentions in writing from one in authourity.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Suggestion made in past come home to roost. You asked for chance to demonstrate plan, ability — now you get it. Draw upon experience. Take older individual into your confidence. Path will be cleared for progress. Know it and be confident.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Lunar aspect is such that you complete project, reach more people and gain greater recognition. Stand tall. Stick to principles. Open lines of communication. Aries, Libra persons could be involved. Travel arrangements for yourself or associate should be considered.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Creativity is solution to apparent dilemma. Means find ways of expressing yourself. Your own style, achievements and methods will rank higher than imitations, other person's procedures. Be confident. Make ally of partner, mate.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Make amends for any slights to one who mean much to you. Defer long-rang decisions. Wait, listen and observe. Be aware of legal ramifications of any actions. Patience is your ally. Build bridges of goodwill. Cancer individual plays important role.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Low-key approach is best — study inviatation could be bright spot. Become more aware of potential. Exchange ideas with Sagittarius, Gemini persons. Employment and special services grab portion of spotlight.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Emphasis is on creative endeavors, basic changes, variety of contacts and experiences. Where emotiions were dormant, they now spring to life. Aquarius, Leo and Scorpio persons could be in picture. Show affection to young person. Throw aside false, foolish pride.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are sensitive, frank, somewhat of a seer in sense that your hunches often are valid. New starts, added independence indicated for this year, with July your most significant month. You make money with Aries and are stimulated by Taurus. Take chance on your own abilities. Grab opportunity to be more "on your own."

But no lady jock

Edminster loves sport

By KATIE KING

Ask any UMie his image of a woman athlete, and you'll get a response similar to this: "Oh, that's easy. She's a masculine, radical, woman's libber with a sixteen inch bicep flex, deep voice, tough face, and bowed legs. On a typical Friday evening, you can find her weightlifting in WOPE, donned in her favorite sweats, which, incidentally, she lives in. In her spare time, she gets her kicks out of running around campus, castrating helpless male UMies. Yup, that's her, the 'lady jock.'"

Now introduce that same UMie to women's basketball star Jenny Edminster, and he'll realize that his image of his "lady jock" is without a doubt one of the worst stereotypes on campus.

Jenny is everything that his image is not. She is a quiet, feminine co-ed, who does not take active part in the present Women's Liberation movement. She couldn't press any more than thirty pounds without great difficulty, and she usually goes out on Friday evenings, like any other woman on campus. In her limited spare time she simply studies or relaxes. "Sports is just another part of my life that I enjoy — like anything else," she claims.

Having played organized basketball since the seventh grade, Jenny, now a sophomore with two years of college varsity experience, recalls having been hassled by her male peers ever since she can remember. "But it seemed to me that the more intelligent guys respected me because they knew that I played only because I was competitive, and I loved the game. They knew I wasn't out to prove anything — and I'm not," she added.

It is fairly obvious to Jenny that women lack the physical strength necessary to compete against men on an equal basis. Men are gaster, bigger, and stronger. However Jenny feels that the present trend to encourage women atheletes, rather to surpress them as has been in the past, is in full bloom both off and on the UMass campus. She cited Little League as an area where women are now competing successfully against men. "But," she added, "It will be a long time before women will be defeating men around here."

JENNEY EDMINSTER

Perhaps a great portion of the blame for this could be placed upon the UMass Women's Physical Education Department. Although the department offers a wide scope of intramural sports, it is not oriented towards strong intercollegiate competition, and therefore grants a minimum of scholarships to women athletes. Also the facilities for women are not anywhere as near advanced or available as they are for men.

Despite this hindrance, the University has produced, nevertheless, a number of fine women athletes who too often are overlooked — Jenny is one of them. She is a consistent, talented, team oriented forward who is counted on time and time again to come through when the team is down. Her teammates readily admit that they look to her for the big points and inspiration, which she almost always produces one-hundred percent. Although she sees no future in basketball professionally, the game presently evolves a great degree of enjoyment, satisfaction and relaxation for her. Jenny works as hard on improving her game as she does on being a woman — which is hardly the image of the stereotyped "lady jock" that many UMies imagine.

NIT no cakewalk

Let's not all get carried away.

In the past week all I've heard about is how the Minutemen are lucky they were bypassed by the UCLA Invitational (more commonly known as the NCAA Tournament) in favor of the NIT. The reason behind this great stroke of fate, so I'm told, is that it will be better to win the NIT than to be eliminated in an early round of the big time.

Well guess again. Anytime you come right out and say that the Minutemen are capable of winning the Madison Square Garden Party, you've said a mouthful.

Granted, the NIT will be a more competitive tournament (provided UCLA beats out USC for the Pac-8 title and advances into the NCAA). But to say that the Minutemen are the class of the field is another matter.

Any team can put together four good nights of basketball and come away with the tourney crown. Virginia Tech did that just last year.

But the field was not as strong as it will be this time around. Notre Dame, Tech's victims in the finals, had a mediocre record that barely topped .500 as they were building for this year's once-beaten, number two ranked team.

This season the field is so strong that it is doubtful that similar versions of last year's winner and runner-up would even be invited.

UMass, St. John's, Manhattan, and Hawaii have already received bids for this year's tournament. These teams are the first picked, but far from the best available.

The class of the tourney will undoubtedly be the two losers in the ACC round robin. Any combination of Maryland, North Carolina, and North Carolina State would have to be rated as the odds-on favorites to cop the crown. In fact, as long as they aren't in the same bracket, I would wager that the two who come to New York will meet in the finals.

But the Atlantic Coast teams are not the only outstanding basketball teams that have yet to be invited. The list of possibilities is, to say the least, impressive.

The country's leading offensive team is indeed a possibility. Maryland-Eastern Shore is the only team in the country averaging over 100 points per game.

Another southern team, University of North Carolina at Charlotte, has a season record of 18-4 and have been outscoring their opponents by 19 points per game.

The Bearcats from the University of Cincinnati have completed their season with a record of 19-7 including a 92-77 pasting of NCAA-bound Marquette on Saturday.

There are still plenty of other capable basketball teams on the outside awaiting bids, including Centenary (20-4), Houston (14-7 with a killer schedule), Jacksonville (16-9), Rutgers (17-6), and let us not forget our conference rivals, UConn (18-7 with wins over Syracuse, Boston College, and, lest we forget, UMass).

In other words, don't count your rebounds before the shot is missed. UMass will be there, and they'll be as competitive as hell. But beyond that, it's all guesswork.

Women hoopsters outclassed

By LINDA MACKLER

The UMass women's basketball team fell to Southern Connecticut State College Saturday afternoon 69-35.

It is obvious why Southern Connecticut is rated fourth in the nation and seeded first in the Regional Tournament. They are a well-disciplined team with a regimented offense and defense. In the third quarter they had no turnovers. They took fourty-one rebounds to UMass' twelve.

Coach Farr, an alumnus and ex-varsity basketball player for Southern Connecticut, claimed, "They are the top team in the East. They have a well-executed fast break but we stayed with them. We just couldn't block their shots."

UMass held their own in the first quarter. They went into the second period down by only seven. But Southern quickly scored four baskets and broke the game wide open. They went into the final quarter leading 62-24.

Sophomore Joanne Smith said, "I expected to be able to run our offense and contain their fast break better."

The junior varsity team did not fare too much better. They also were defeated, but only 48-42.

Coach Ellen Greaves was very dissappointed in the team's performance. "We suffered a lack of concentration in the second half, she said. Our press was effective but we made too many mental errors. There were twenty-four turnovers and you can't expect to win with that. Of course, Southern Connecticut is an excellent team."

Nancy O'Neil was both high scorer and rebounder. She had twelve points aad made eleven grabs. She was not as upset with the performance.

"Our major weakness was that we didn't break the press well," she said, "but I don't think we have too much to complain about. We played a decent game."

The two teams will be playing their final regular season games Tuesday night at home against Smith. Starting time is at 6:30 p.m. in WOPE Gym.

Sittler shoots Leafs over stunned B's, 6-4

BOSTON (AP) — The Toronto Maple Leafs, led by Darryl Sittler posted their first National Hockey League victory in Boston in nearly six years Sunday night, stunning the Bruins 6-4.

Sittler scored his 34th goal and assisted on two other tallies as the Leafs defeated the Bruins at the Garden for the first time since March 31, 1968. Toronto had an 0-15-2 record in the long stretch.

Johnny Bycyk put the Bruins on the board in the opening period, stickhandling through the Toronto defense, before the Leafs got going.

Sittler tied the score, sinking a long rebound of Mike Pelyk's shot, and Ron Ellis set up Norm Ullman at the corner of the Boston goal to put the Leafs in front.

Toronto rookie Ian Turnbull and Boston defenseman Dallas Smith traded goals 14 seconds apart in the second period and the Leafs' Jim McKenney and Wayne Cashman also matched goals late in the session.

Pelyk and Dave Keon beat Boston goalie Gilles Gilbert with tallies in the final period, before Cashman got the last goal on a power play in the last minute.

Celts sunk in OT, 108-102

BOSTON (AP) — Walt Frazier, held to six points for four periods, came through with a tie-breaking three-point play in overtime and the New York Knicks went on to a 108-102 National Basketball Association victory over the Boston Celtics Sunday for a split of a weekend series.

With the score 99-99, Frazier drove in for a layup, was fouled on the play and cashed the free throw to give New York the lead to stay.

Bill Bradley sank a pair of baskets around one by Don Nelson and the Kicks were home free for their second victory in six meetings with the Celtics this season.

Frazier capped a New York comeback sparked by Dave DeBusschere with a pair of free throws which put New York in front 93-92 with 47 seconds remaining in regulation.

The lead then was swapped until Bradley put New York ahead on a long jump shot with four seconds left.

Former pitcher Tom White will report with Phillies

By MIKE BROPHY
MDC Baseball Writer

Tom White, former UMass pitcher and 1973 UMass co-captain will report to the Philadelphia Phillies minor league training camp in Clearwater, Fla. for a tryout, it was learned Saturday.

Dick Tedd, Executive Scout for the Phillies announced Saturday while attending the seventh annual UMass baseball clinic that he had talked with White and had taken him through a preliminary workout last week. He also said, "Tom is big, strong and a lefty. We are going to give him the chance he wants and I think he has a good one. He has regained his control and speed on the ball and if he continues to improve at this rate, he could be deadly."

White finished up last season with a 3-3 record while striking out 66 opponents in 57 innings. "Tom is also a strikeout artist who, when he is on, can put the ball right where he wants it," Teed added.

Also to White's credit were three saves and a 3.93 ERA on the season in which he made 14 appearances. Perhaps White's finest performance of the season last year came on the western trip where he blanked nationally ranked Vanderbuilt 2-0 on six hits, while striking out eight batters in his nine inning performance.

White has always been known as a good hitting pitcher and last year posted a .350 batting average while collecting one triple on the year.

HOW DO YOU THINK MOST PEOPLE YOUR AGE DIE?

It's not drugs.
It's not suicide.
And it's not cancer.
It's automobile crashes.
More American people between the ages of 15 and 25 die in automobile crashes than in any other way.
At least half of those deaths are alcohol related. And the drunk drivers who cause most of them are under 25. Sometimes, many times, they kill themselves.
One of the most dangerous things you can do is get drunk and drive home.
You can change it. You have to.
You march against the war. You fight for clean air and clean water. You eat natural foods. You practice yoga. You are so much for life. And you are so much against killing.
It would be unthinkable for you to wittingly kill another human being.
So then, why is this happening?

Gymnastics teams win big

Seniors help women dance past South Conn

By CANDY GROSS

Before a capacity crowd Saturday afternoon, the senior women led the UMass women's gymnastics team to a convincing victory over Southern Connecticut with a score of UM 103.35 to SC 95.55.

In the opening ceremonies of the meet, the seniors were each presented with a corsage as a small token of appreciation for their hard work and dedication to the team.

Vaulting proved to be the closest event of the evening as UMass won it by only .8 points with a score of 25.95 to SC's 25.15. Jeannine Burger took first with an 8.85, followed by a UM tie at 8.55 between senior Margie Combs and freshman Linda Nelligan. Southern Connecticut stole the third and fourth positions though, with Terry DeNardi's 8.45 and Polly Dellagoia's 8.4 In all, it was a high scoring event with only one score in the high sevens, indicating the good depth on both teams.

The bars event had its high and low points that evening. Two of UMass' seniors, bar specialist Betsy East and Captain Anne Vexler tied for top position at 8.55 Both routines flowed nicely from one move to the next, Betsy not letting the unsettling SC injury interfere with her performance in the least. Mary Fedyn of SC threw some nice tricks to earn an 8.45 second followed by another UM tie between Jeannine Burger and Linda Nelligan at 8.25. The one low point of the evening came when an unfortunate problem upon dismounting cost SC's All Arounder Terry DeNardi some points and a dislocated knee. This removed her from competition for the rest of the evening.

At the end of the two events, Southern Connecticut's 49.30 put them two points behind UMass'-51.30.

Balance beam was dominated by senior Anne Vexler's 9.3 routine, which saw her tumbling, leaping and turning with amplitude previously unseen by many in the crowd. UM's Jodi Hitt took second with 8.5, again displaying the style of dance for which she's being recognized. Southern Connecticut captured the third and fourth positions with Mary Beth Huber's 7.9 and Polly Dellagoia's 7.85. The beam event on the whole is becoming less of a 'down fall' for UMass, as fairly solid routines were given by the whole beam team. The event score was a quite substantial 25.55 to SC 22.35.

Floor exercise brought the fitting close to this season's home meets when, as Anne Vexler finished her overwhelming performance, the crowd rose in a standing ovation, demanding she present herself one more time. Not to be forgotten are the close second and third place routines of Jeannine Burger and Margie Combs, which earned 8.75 and 8.7 respectively. SC's Polly Dellagois took fourth with 8.45 followed by UM's Marian Kulick and Jodi Hitt. The event was completely UMass' as indicated by their score of 26.50 points to SC's 23.90.

Anne Vexler won the All Around with 34.95 points and second place went to Jeannine Burger's 33.60. SC's Mary Beth Huber and Mary Fedyn took third and fourth, respectively.

On Tuesday evening, March 5th at 8:00, the JV's will travel to Springfield for another close meet between these two rivals. The final dual meet will take place next Saturday, March 9th. when the team meets a strong Clarion State team at Clarion State.

Tired men pommel Big Red in eastern tuneup

By WALT POWERS

In warmups just prior to Saturday afternoon's men's gymnastics meet a Cornell vaulter rumbled down the takeoff lane, made a sloppy, lunging handstand, and toppled flat on his face. This triggered a paroxysm of giggling from the Cornell bench, and if UMass never got excited in the 154.65-146.95 romp that followed, it was hard to blame them. As the meet neared an end, two bored Cornellians sprawled on the floor in front of their bench, and one got the impression that the freewheeling Minutemen couldn't have lost this meet had they tried.

The final dual meet of the season saw the Minutemen give one of their weakest performances, but considering the circumstances, it was a good effort. Gene Whelan emerged sleepless from an all-star meet the night before where he beat half the Polish National team and the enitire American squad, which included Olympian John Crosby. (The Polish team finished fourth in the 1972 Olympics.) The entire team endured a seven-hour bus ride, and Rich Seikunas didn't even make the trip. Then there was their competition, which at times deteriorated to high-school level. UMass had an insurmountable lead after the second event, and the rest of their afternoon was spent in a successful experiment with compulsory routines and difficult dismounts.

The Minutemen jumped out to a one point lead after the floor exercises, even though Dave Apple gave the most impressive Cornell performance of the afternoon. The Big Red seemed totally lost on sidehorse, where UMass "pommelled" them 25.35-21.25. Instrumental in this meet-winning trouncing were Steve Marks (8.25) and Brian Hassig (8.55).

After that it was garbage time. With no pressure on them, the Minutemen were just plain sloppy, but the Big Red seemed bent on showing the crowd of about a hundred friends and relatives how difficult gymnastics really is. The notable exception was dismounting, where almost everbody from UMass landed spectacular double-back somersaults or full forward-twists. Also on the plus side were surprising showings from John Brandon (8.15) and Co-Captain Jay Thomsen (8.25) on the high bar.

All in all, the meet was a relaxing tuneup for this week's Eastern Championships, which will be held in the same arena. The win gave the Minutemen a dual meet record of 8-3, overall and 6-3 in the conference. Cornell may be no. 1 in the Ivy League, but the Easterns? Who are they kidding?

Wrestlers tie Rhody in New Englands

By JOHN BOCK
MDC Staff Wrestling Writer

HANOVER, N.H. - "The tie is ours, the loss is theirs", exclaimed a jubilant Coach Homer Barr as his Minutemen grapplers claimed a share of the first place trophy in the New England University Wrestling Association's Championship Tournament held in Alumni Gymnasium on the Dartmouth College campus.

The Rhode Island Rams were odds-on favorites to win the title and before the varsity consolation finals they held what seemed like an insurmountable lead. For UMass to come from way behind and tie them (139½ points apiece) is a tale of sacrifice and competition that makes collegiate athletics something special.

OVER THE TOP goes Dennis Fenton's opponent in a recent match against Dartmouth. It was the same story on Saturday when he won the New England Heavyweight title.

Winning titles for UMass were champions Larry Reynolds at 118, Russell Chateauneuf at 134, Steve Benson at 158, and Dennis Fenton at Heavyweight. Their story and contributions are just part of a weekend that left observers and a sad Rhode Island contingent of fans shaking their heads and drying their eyes.

The Minutemen entered the tournament with a 9-7 dual match record and a second place in the Yankee Conference tournament. With the exception of Steve Benson no Minuteman had an impressive dual match record. Most of the season UMass could never be counted on to wrestle the same lineup twice due to injuries and weight problems. One thing that a poor dual match season does for the individual is to give him a poor seed in the tournament. That is where Coach Barr's boys found themselves on Friday morning as Rhode Island came out of the seeding meeting with five top seeds to UMass' one. Even Boston University had three number one seeds and that spelled trouble for the Minutemen.

If it bothered them, though, it never showed as they went on to upset the seedings seven times before the tournament was over. As in any tourney it is place winners that can make the difference with winning and losing and in that respect UMass had the personnell that understood what the expression "hang in there, baby!" means. The other six team members placed no less than fourth. Second place winner was Robin Osborne at 190, while Doug LeMire and Steve Jabaut took thirds at 142 and 167 pounds, respectively, and Dick Muri, Cliff Blom, and Bob Spaulding placed fourth at 126, 150, and 177.

After the quarter final round Boston University was given the best chance of beating URI because they were tied with them and still had eight of ten alive. It was in the consolation semi-finals that things changed for the Terriers as they failed to claim any more than two finalists for the consoldations. UMass had four finalists and that margin gave them the lead over BU.

To catch Rhode Island though meant that one of two things had to happen - every Massachusetts wrestler had to win in the finals and consolation finals or URI had to blow a few matches. A combination of the two was what UMass forced. In the consolations Doug LeMire and Steve Jabaut were outstanding. LeMire pinned Kevin Keyes of Dartmouth in 1:56 to take third. It was sweet revenge because Keyes had beaten Doug 7-1 in the quarters. Steve Jabaut showed he is the gutsiest wrestler UMass has, as he beat UConn's George Smith 7-4 for third place. Jabaut was at least two weight classes above what he normally wrestled and managed to take a strong third and even give the champion at that class a run for it.

At 126 pounds Dick Muri lost to slick and smooth two time NEUWA Champ Scott Pucino 6-1 in the semi-finals, but proved that he can stay in there with him. In the consolations he was robbed of a reversal and near fall and thus third place.

The most unfortunate wrestler on the team was Cliff Blom who was the second seed at 150 but managed to place fourth. Blom was just not himself in his semi-final bout with URI's Dave Hovey and lost 6-3 despite a brilliant third period performance that should have had Hovey penalized for stalling but saw nothing done. In the consolation semi-finals Cliff received an elbow to the eye that resulted in eight stitches to close a nasty gash and left him with a king-size headache. In the finals for third place the extremes of pain, fatigue, and disappointment caused him to lose a riding time decision to Glenn Smith of Maine.

The stage was set for the finals with UMass ahead of BU by twelve but down to URI by about the same. In the championship at 118 pounds was UMass Larry Reynolds and URI's Rich Adham. Reynolds was the third seed by virtue of the fact that he had never wrestled at 118 during the season. He had upset Jeff Lambert of BU in the afternoon semi-final by an 8-4 score. In the evening match Adham took Reynolds down in the beginning of the first period and rode him out. The second period Reynolds had the advantage and really pushed Adham and finally put him on his back for two. In the third period Larry escaped and hit Adham with everything he had and caught him with a pancake that put him in the mat for the pin at 5:51.

Meet Vermont in semi-final Wednesday night in Burlington

Skaters upend Boston State, 7-4

By DAVE EIBEL

They came, they scored, they conquered.

In the almost empty Boston Arena, the Minutemen upset fourth-seeded Boston State College to the tune of 7-4 last Saturday night to advance to the semi-finals of the Division Two Playoffs against Vermont, this coming Wednesday night.

It was a game which had all the ingredients of UMass' two most recent outings against Vermont and Northeastern-clutch offensive play and the stellar goaltending of Chick Rheault, who has lately adapted to his new job of being a target on a firing rant but, unlike the target, refuses to be scored upon, with any great frequency.

The first period of the game was full of Boston State disappointments in that state took twenty shots on Rheault, only counting once — a rebound goal at the 0:51 mark by John Caccamo.

The Minutemen played with extreme caution in the early going but seemed to get stronger after Jim Lynch tied it at 7:58 on a rebound off a Bill Mintiens slapshot. Ten minutes later, at 17:56 Carl Bruns defelcted a Lynch shot past Boston goalie Paul McBrine and the Minutemen had the lead for good.

But they broke the game open during a span of 3:49 of the second period during which they outscored their opponents 4-2.

Mike Merchant picked up two within 54 seconds, at 9:14 and 10:08. Kevin Conners scored the prettiest goal of the night, and the winner, at 12:28 when he picked up a Mike Ellis pass at center, walked in all alone decked McBrine and backhanded the puck into the right corner of the net. At 13:03 Steve Nims scored a powerplay marker only 7 seconds after State's Bob Layrie was penalized for tripping when he slapped in a rebound off a scramble. Paul Fisher, State's leading scorer, scored both second period goals for his team, the first on a deflection at 10:27, the second a wristshot from the slot at 12:37.

It was the period that turned the game around. The Minutemen came back agter a flat first stanza and put tremendous pressure on McBrine firing 18 labelled shots at him. The UMass onslaught took all the wind out of Boston State's sails-all that was left after they fired twenty shots on Rheault in the first period and only came away with one goal.

In a totally academic third-period UMass' Jim Lyons, scored 52 seconds into the period on a slap shot from the edge of the left face off circle to make it 7-3. Boston State closed out the scoring at 6:59 when Joe Legro converted on a 2-on 1 break with Caccamo.

Sirica to decide on Nixon

HARRY F. ROSENTHAL
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica will hold a hearing tomorrow to determine disposition of a secret grand jury report said to deal with President Nixon's role in Watergate.

The judge set the hearing for open court after a meeting requested by James D. St. Clair, Nixon's lawyer in Watergate-related matters.

"All interested counsel may state their views regarding the disposition of the report and recommendation filed last Friday by the 1972 grand jury," Sirica said after meeting with St. Clair, assistant prosecutors and lawyers for H. R. Haldeman and John D. Ehrlichman.

White House deputy press secretary Gerald L. Warren confirmed St. Clair asked for Monday's meeting and added: "Our position will be made known in open court, I have nothing further to say at this time."

Earlier in the day Warren had said "there is no present intention" on the part of the White House to ask that the grandjury's report be withheld from the House impeachment inquiry.

Asked whether the President's lawyers planned to make any representations to Sirica, he said "not to my knowledge."

After the Sirica meeting, Warren said he didn't know that St. Clair planned to request it. "If he was," Warren said, "he didn't tell me."

The judge's reference to the "recommendation" was the first public confirmation that the grand jury had accompanied its report with a suggestion of what should become of it.

There had been published reports that the jury asked it be forwarded to the House Judiciary Committee.

Sirica did not spell out the subject matter of the report in his brief statement.

The report, said to be in 5 paragraphs, was handed to the judge along with the Watergate coverup indictments of H. R. Haldeman, John D. Ehrlichman, John N. Mitchell and four others last Friday. There also was a satchel full of documents.

Sirica told a reporter he spent part of the weekend researching the law for precedents to guide him in his decision.

Warren said the White House was not aware what the report contained.

But he said, in reference to reports last weekend that the grand jury detailed Nixon's involvement in the coverup, "presumptions are being made that you gentlemen should be very cautious about."

"I'm not in a position to discuss the sealed report because it is a grand jury matter presented to the court in a traditional secret manner," Warren said.

More indictments are expected in the coming days from two other Watergate grand juries.

It was believed that charges growing out of the activities of the White House Special Investigations unit, particularly the foray for psychiatric records of Daniel Ellsberg, would be returned in midweek.

David Johnston finds the streaking situation "amusing", but worries about the ensuing noise created by crowds.

Police "relaxed" with streakers

By FRITS GUERTSEN
MDC Staff

"The police will respond to all complaints concerning streaking," said David Johnston, UMass Director of Public Safety, "but we're taking a relaxed line with it right now."

Johnston, who finds the situation "amusing", said that the biggest problem was not the streaking itself, but the ensuing noise created by crowds drawn by the streakers.

"We've had a lot of complaints," he said, "not only from students, but from Amherst residents concerning the noise. Let's face it - we don't live in a vacuum here and we have to take into account the rights of area residents."

Johnston added that he thought the noise problem could be better controlled by residence hall staffs rather than the police.

Thus far there has only been one streaking-related arrest on campus, and that person was not a student.

"The only reason the arrest was made," said Johnston, "was that the person stopped. What the police want to do is keep the streakers streaking. It's when they stop somewhere that we take action."

The FBI released a statement last Friday condemning streaking. Their rationale was that charges stemming from a streaking arrest could jeopardize a person's job opportunities later in life.

Saul Chafin, Assistant Director of Operations for the Department of Public Safety, explained this further. "The charge goes down as indecent exposure in the books, but no explanation goes with it. It could just as easily be a sexual offense and no one would know the difference."

"What we're doing here," he continued, "is charging the offender with disorderly conduct, not indecent exposure. Unless, of course, someone decides to parade around in broad daylight."

"So far," said Chafin, "there have been no complaints about either overaction or inaction on the part of the police."

Johnston sees the entire situation as healthy. "It's a far cry from students throwing bombs and fighting police. I see this as indicative of a change back to normalcy, a return to traditional student behavior. It's a welcome change, from a law enforcement official's viewpoint."

Chafin said "It's a return to the fifties and fun. Students have been too serious lately - involved in all sorts of issues and totally humorless."

Jesse Jackson talks tomorrow at Amherst

The Reverend Jesse L. Jackson, national civil rights leader and Black business advocate, will deliver the keynote address at the Amherst College Black Business Symposium at 8 p.m. tomorrow in the College's Johnson Chapel. All symposium events are open to the public without charge.

Entitled "Black Capitalism: Myth or Reality", the Symposium lectures, workshops, and panel discussions will examine the roles, successes, and failures of Black businessmen and Black-oriented businesses. The risks, compromises and general feasability of a Black person pursuing a career in business will be illustrated during the course of the events of the three-day symposium.

The next symposium event scheduled after Jackson's speech will be an address by Ken Guscott, president of Guscott Associates, a Boston-based employment recruiting agency, at 8 p.m. Friday, in Johnson Chapel.

On Saturday, speeches will be given by Black managers in biracially owned businesses and corporations; the general goal of the sppeches is an identification of risks endemic to the business world in relationship to Black businessmen. Black businessmen with expertise in corporate ventures will exchange ideas with student participants in a series of workshops throughout the day. The titles of some of the workshops are "The Black Entrepreneur: Community Development", "Blacks in Media", "The Role of the Black Manager in the White Corporation", and "Black Marketing".

The Reverent Jackson, handpicked by the late Reverend Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. to serve as national director of Operation Breadbasket, has long been a proponent of the important role Black businessmen can assume in their communities. He is currently the director of special projects and economic development of the Souther Christian Leadership Conference and president of Operation P.U.S.H. (People United to Save Humanity), an issue-oriented lobby.

Other speakers and panelists include Ted Adams, president of the National Association of Black Manufacturers; Dr. Flourney Cole of Vanderbilt University School of Management; Thomas Farrington, president of Input-Output; Atlanta University Professor of Business Administration; Dexter Eure of the Boston Globe newpaper.

The Black Business Symposium is being planned by the Straight Ahead Executive Committee, the governing arm of the Amherst-based Intra New England Black Students Organization.

Olver says Quinn misinformed over Belchertown funds

By MARK VOGLER
MDC Staff

Sen. John Olver (D-Amherst) Monday accused Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn of providing inaccurate information regarding the source of funds allocated for Belchertown State School.

Last week on WUMV's "Telopolitics" (UMass videotape production), Quinn said he feared progress could be setback in the state's institutions for the mentally retarded by taking out of the budgets of other state schools to provide the necessary funds for Belchertown.

Yesterday Olver said Quinn was "not very aware" of the recent $2.6 million budget passed by the legislature as a result of a suit filed two years ago by the Belchertown State School Friends Association.

"Not only is the suit responsible for more capitol outlays and operating funds for Belchertown, but it also achieved the same for other institutions across the state," Olver said.

"It really puzzles me that Mr. Quinn would even suggest 'that we are robbing from Peter to pay Paul.' The facts just don't support this."

Olver charged that each of the other institutions may have to sue the state to release monies that the legislature had appropriated because "the Administration is flouting and violating legislative intent."

Dr. Benjamin Ricci, president of the Friends Association and a UMass professor said Quinn was "totally ignorant of the legislative process."

"The $2.6 million gained through our consent decree represents money which had already been budgeted for Belchertown State School. Through judicial pressure, we merely assured its release," Ricci said.

"An example of what might have happened took place last Thursday when Gov. Sargent permitted $1.1 million -- which had already been allocated by the legislature for direct care at other positions (Monson, Dever and Fernald State Schools) was transferred to the welfare budget. Who's robbing whom?"

Ricci said Quinn had no right to accept credit in helping to achieve the consent decree because the attorney general "permitted stalling -- through legal manuvering -- which extended for 21 months and 28 days from the filing of the suit."

Quinn last week said he has a record of "continuing support of aid to retarded persons."

"And if there has been any dispute it is because I represent the agencies of Government," he said.

Course offered for veterans

Dr. Ken Lenchitz, a staff psychologists at the Veteran's Administrative Hospital in Northampton, is co-ordinating a course through the School of Education entitled: "Vietnam Veterans: Something Different, Nothing Special."

The course deals with the specific problems that a Vet may encounter and is designed to give them a clearer perspective. The course is very unstructured and rap sessions are encouraged.

Although Veterans comprise about 10 per cent of the UMass student population, this is the first time a course such as this has been offered.

Dr. Lenchitz is running the course as an extension of the Mental Hygiene Clinic at the V.A. Hospital in conjunction with the Veteran's Affairs Office.

Bill Staton, a student in the course and a staff member at Room-to-Move, has long awaited a course such as this and was happy to see it implemented: "Veteran's needs are finally starting to be recognized--but it's still far from being enough."

Staton speaks to Vets with empathy: "As a Nam Vet I put up with the same shit you did yesterday and I hassel with the same games you do today." He says this can lead to personal or educational problems that may warrant attention.

A big problem is the age difference between most Vets and today's college student. One Vet said "it's like going to school with a bunch of kids."

There are other programs being offered for Veterans through Room-to-Move. They have a Vet's Rap Session, in addition to one-to-one counseling, crisis intervention, an alchohol rap session, and a referral system when necessary.

Like everywhere else-Amherst living cost is high

By JOHN P. HARRINGTON

The Amherst area is no exception — it's getting more and more expensive to live. And for students here, the high cost of living has stimulated a stiffer-than-ever competition for part time jobs. Most remain unemployed.

In the Amherst area the demand for jobs is extremely high but the supply is severely limited.

For those who find a job, the quality of work is apt to be low, the wages poor, and the attitude of employers "take it or leave it."

Turnover rates are high, especially in jobs like dishwashing and telephone soliciting. For every employee who quits there are many more waiting to take his or her space.

The job-hunting student finds that wages offered to students are low-sometimes between $2.00 and $2.50, but often only the Massachusetts minimum wage of $1.85.

Much of the work available to students in the Amherst area is service type work in restaurants, take-out establishments, and the like. The gas shortage has cut back on gasoline pumping jobs.

According to Patricia Grossman of the UMass Financial Aid Office, about 100 to 150 students a week visit her office looking for jobs.

The Financial Aid Office maintains a listing of known available jobs, but Grossman said that most of the jobs are unattractive; a high percentage are housekeeping and babysitting.

Richard Dent, Director of Financial Aid said "there's just not that many jobs." He said 700-800 applications are on hand in Financial Aid at any one time.

Currently the Financial Aid Office is attempting to improve the listing system and formalize a procedure for keeping contact with prospective employers and undergrads.

Charles Perusse, manager of the Woolco store in Mountain Farms Mass, said, "If I have a job opening I'll have it filled very soon." Persusse said he employs about 40 percent students.

Frank Brown, Manager of Zayre's in Hadley, said it's difficult to estimate the number of students seeking jobs at his store.

Brown said there is "quite an influx" of job hunters at the beginning of every semester. During the semester an average of 10 to 15 students a week apply, he said.

What are some of the area jobs like? Exploitation may be too strong a word some say, but dissatisfaction is certainly not strong enough.

The McDonald's work experience begins with filmstrip indoctrination, instructing the employee on all aspects of "McLife" — everything from turning the quarter pounder to suggestive selling.

The "Management Team" makes it clear that the empolyee is expected to be busy at all times, to use deoderant, and to memorize the store's phone number.

Waste baskets are called "castle bins"; everything is jargonized and systematized. Beepers, buzzers, and other noise bombard the employee constantly, who is paid $1.85 an hour.

Foreign language requirement: it still is

By FRITS GEURTSEN

You got something against the foreign language requirement?

So do a lot of people, but the fact is it exists. And while it dies you've either got to go along with it, get a waiver — or not graduate.

If you're waiting for the requirement to go away, don't hold your breath. It's not likely to happen soon, if at all.

According to Dean James Shaw of the Casiac Office, "Relatively few requirement waivers are granted, but we don't wish to discourage people with this. There are students who for one reason or another can't fulfill the language requirement. We sincerely hope that any and all students who fell that they have a block where languages are concerned will come in and talk to us."

"Even if we can't grant a waiver," he continued, "we have a number of substitutions to offer. We're working more with the spirit of the requirement than the exact letter."

The Casiac office is in charge of all waivers, not only those involving foreign lnguages. Anyone with any questions or problems is invited to come to the Office in Machmer Hall.

As Dean Shaw put it, "I would like to see students taking more initiative with their own education. I don't like to see them accepting anything without question.".

Dwight Allen: he won't walk out of an unfinished job

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

UMass education school dean Dwight D. Allen might accept a new job at another institution if a sufficiently attractive offer were made, but he's not actively seeking it.

The colorful and active educator made that statement in an interview with The Collegian to review the school's activities and achievements.

Sitting in his cushioned office chair at Marks Meadows school and drinking the characteristic one-quart bottle of diet drink, Allen described the job he might take.

"I might consider anything from working in a foundation to the presidency of a rapidly growing institution interested in change -- maybe even a superintendantship," Allen said.

"No one could accuse me of walking out on a mess or an unfinished job," he said, adding that at the same time, "the school is not in a position where it would benefit from a change of dean."

Among the school's achievements in alternative education and minority recruitment since he took the helm in the late sixties Allen cited the Career Opportunities Program (COP) as one of the most successful.

He said the program, which UMass administers with federal funding, would graduate 180 Brooklyn, N.Y. students with advanced degrees in education this spring, out of 211 who originally enrolled in the program.

"For the first time I feel comfortable in going if something comes up," he said, adding, "the place is working and has active agendas."

He cited what he called an "excellent" intersession 1974 education marathons another example of positive achievement by the school. The marathon is a twice-a-year potpourri of lectures, seminars and classes by visiting educators and experts on a variety of topics in education innovation.

Dwight Allen would accept good job offer...

This year the event was held over two weeks from January 14 to 25, the last two weeks of intersession before the second semester began. Other years it has been offered in March and October and over a single week.

Allen said attendance over the two-week period this year was 4,000 compared to 7,000 over a one-week marathon in spring of 1973.

Allen labelled as "uninformed criticism" statements by some of his critics that he has spent too much time promoting educational innovation and change without practicing it. "We have not done a very effective job of publicizing what we've done," he said in response.

On the "agenda" for the future, according to Allen, is a cooperative program with the Boston School Committee to revitalize the academic and educational environment of Boston English High through the offer of a graduate UMass education degree to the entire professional staff of the school if over a period of years they can show improvement by a set of pre-arranged criteria.

The cooperative program was supposed to have been approved by the School Committee at a meeting in Boston several weeks ago but was postponed by last-minute arrangements. School Committee chairman John Kerrigan is a doctoral candidate at UMass, Allen said.

Whether he stays or goes, the veteran of two building take-overs, numerous confrontations and a heck of a lot of hustling for money is happy where he is as long as ther's nothing better to go to.

"There are a whole lot of really interesting projects that we're into," he said.

Today is the Amherst town caucus primary

Radical town meeting candidates to meet tomorrow

It's been going strong in Ann Arbor, Madison, and Berkeley since 1971 radical electoral politics inspired by the new college vote. Somehow a post-1970 radical movement in Amherst has yet to be seen.

The Amherst Tea Party has been busy translating radical political ideals into local electoral politics. "Now we have completed our educational phase of political work," says Tea Party spokesperson, Jean Murray, "and are now watering the grassroots in hopes of sprouting some popular action."

The Tea Party has released a "Plan for 1974 Radical Politics" as is explained below:

If you live in Precinct 7 (Puffton and vicinity) and are a possible candidate for Town Meeting Member or a political worker, "YOU ARE INVITED TO A MEETING AT 219 PUFFTON ON THURS., MARCH 7, at 7:30says spokesperson Murray. If they find 3 more candidates (they have two volunteers so far) they are "in business" with a Precinct 7 Tea Party slate. People from other precincts are also invited.

If they get a slate, here are the legal dates and their suggestions for a "Radical Spring Political Calendar."

March 8: Deadline for filing nomination papers with the Town Clerk (requiring 10 signatures of registered voters in Precinct 7.)
March 20: Deadline for a special voter registration session in the Campus Center (which citizens can require the Town Clerk to hold.)
March 21: Beginning of 20 day permit for political signs (a 5 candidate slate is entitled to 10 signs on a public right-of-way.)
March 25: Deadline for Warrant Articles to be filed for presentation to Town Meeting. (They can present an unlimited number on 10 signatures. They plan to treat their Articles as the planks on their local platform.)
April 9: Election day (car pool to the polls.)
May 6: Town Meeting. If elected, they plan to find support "amongst true liberals and strange-bedfellow true conservatives" to pass some legislation.)

"Seeing that people are doubtful of us winning and may not bother to vote, we need good PR about our progress, like the Heart Fund has: namely a 'Voting Thermometer.' " They plan to make a deal with each potential voter thusly: "(1) You endorse our Tea Party Slate on the basis of our righteous beliefs and (2) promise to go down and vote for us only if we show you that we have rallied up 199 other supporters like yourself. (3) If elected, we push for our platform without chickenshit. (4) If we become chickenshit while in office, you kick our asses."

Here's the Tea Party secret: Because non-student voter turnout is only 35 per cent in Town elections and last year's winners needed only 119 to 187 votes to win (while the losers got 85 to 114 votes), therefore, they claim to be a cinch to win with 200 sure votes (plus "hidden allies.")

As the candidates gain endorsements they plan to tally them up on a "Voting Thermometer." Only if they get a "hot" reading of 200 voter-degrees do they expect people to make good on their promise to vote.

"But do students in Puffton have the spirit to govern themselves," that is the question Murray asks, "or have we already signed in as happy lackeys in Brave New World?"

The Tea Party has released an outline of its 1974 Platform which is re-printed below:

TEA PARTY PLATFORM OUTLINE

I. QUALITY OF LIFE.
Stop the developers (Save our woods and farms and lower taxes.)
Rent control.
Polution Prevention (stop sewage in our rivers and all nuclear power.)

HALDEMAN AFTER INDICTMENT--H.R. Haldeman talks briefly to newsmen at the door of his home in Newport Beach, Cal., after learning a grand jury in Washington, D.C., had indicted him and six others on charges of conspiracy to obstruct Watergate investigations. The former top White House aide was charged with three counts of perjury and one of conspiracy to obstruct justice.

Got a requirement gripe? Questionnez votre education!

By FRITS GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

You got something against the foreign language requirement?

So do a lot of people, but the fact is it exists. And while it does you've either got to go along with it, get a waiver - or not graduate.

If you're waiting for the requirement to go away, don't hold your breath. It's not likely to happen soon, if at all.

According to Dean James Shaw of the Casiac Office, "Relatively few requirement waivers are granted, but we don't wish to discourage people with this. There are students who for one reason or another can't fulfill the language requirement. We sincerely hope that any and all students who feel that they have a block where languages are concerned will come in and talk to us."

"Even if we can't grant a waiver," he continued, "we have a number of substitutions to offer. We're working more with the spirit of the requirement than the exact letter."

The Casiac office is in charge of all waivers, not only those involving foreign languages. Anyone with any questions or problems is invited to come to the office in Machmer Hall.

As Dean Shaw put it, "I would like to see students taking more initiatize with their own education. I don't like to see them accepting anything without question."

The MDC erroneously reported yesterday that the lecture given Sunday night by Israeli journalist Amos Elon was sponsored by the Distinguished Visitors Program. The article should have said that Mr. Elon was being sponsored by Hillel at UMass.

Mistrial move denied; Stans to testify

NEW YORK (AP) - Former Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans revealed through his lawyers yesterday that he will testify in his own behalf at his criminal conspiracy trial.

His codefendant, onetime Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell has not announced whether he will take the stand.

Stans' disclosure came after the judge denied a defense motion for a mistrial.

In his opening statement to a jury of eight men and four women, Stans' defense chief, Walter Bonner, said his client twice had voluntarily gone before the grand jury that indicted the two former Cabinet members.

"Maurice Stans is going to rise again, and he is going to speak a third time, and this time he'll speak to you," the bush-haired Washington, D.C. defense attorney declared in a 55-minute address to the panel.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of accepting a secret $200,000 presidential campaign contribution from international financier Robert Vesco.

In return, the government charges, Mitchell and Stans tried to impede a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation that eventually led to a $224 million civil suit, charging Vesco with looting companies he controlled at the expense of stockholders.

The first witness as the third week of the trial began, was recently appointed SEC Chairman Irving M. Pollack. He testified for the government on the origins and background of the Vesco investigation.

"Did Mr. Mitchell ever attempt to influence you personnally on any case under your jurisdiction" Pollack was asked on cross-examination by Fleming.

"No sir," replied the witness, who was appointed SEC chairman Feb. 14.

In a 45-minute statement in Michell's behalf, his lawyer, Peter Fleming Jr. said the government's case was based on "suspicion and innuendo."

Aside from a fleeting introduction at a political gathering, Fleming said Mitchell had never met Vesco.

Fleming sought to soften the impact of the $200,000 figure on the jury's mind, declaring: "That $200,000 was part of $60 million that was contributed by the people of this country, obviously some of them rich, obviously some of them poor, to support the re-election of the President."

Bonner brought a mist to Stans' eyes when he described the former commerce secretary a burdened throughout the campaign by the illness of his wife of 40 years. The lawyer said she was near death at times from a blood disease so rare there were only 100 prior recorded cases in this country.

U.S. and the world

High court denies GI objectors benefits

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Supreme Court ruled eight to one yesterday that Congress may properly deny veterans education benefits to conscientious objectors who perform civilian service as an alternative to the draft.

There is a rational basis for treating veterans and conscientious objectors differently, the court said, since the aim of the benefit law is to make military service more attractive and to aid in readjustment after the disruptive effects of active duty in the service.

Black Militant

The Court also refused to hear a plea from H. Rap Brown that he deserves a new trial on a federal firearms charge because of alleged illegal electronic surveillance by the government.

Over the objection of Justice William O. Douglas, the court let stand a decision by the U.S. Circuit Court at New Orleans upholding Brown's conviction and sentence of five years and a $2,000 fine for transporting a firearm on a plane from New York to New Orleans while under indictment elsewhere.

The black militant's lawyers argued that electronic surveillance by the government, and by New Orleans jail officials who monitored a call between Brown and his lawyer William M. Kunstler, violated Brown's rights.

Kunstler claimed that Brown's right to counsel was violated when the jail officials passed on information from the call to the FBI. The circuit court found the information irrelevant to the conviction.

Kunstler also attacked the legality of the federal electronic surveillance which also has been found not relevant to the firearms conviction.

Cable TV

Also, the fledging cable television industry won twin victories in the Court that are expected to save operators considerable money.

The court ruled 6 to 3 that cable TV operators are not liable for copyright fees for programs picked up by microwave and imported from commercial stations in distant communities.

And the court decided 6 to 2 that cable operators do not have to pay the annual fee of 30 cents per subscriber imposed on them by the Federal Communications Commission. The court said the fee was a tax that can be levied only by Congress.

In the copyright decision written by Justice Potter Stewart, the court said cable operators merely act as a transmitter and not as a performer and thus escapes liability for copyright fees to the producers.

David H. Foster, president of the National Cable Television Association, said this "puts us in a better negotiation position" on legislation stymied in Congress for years on cable TV copyright fees.

The case was brought against TelePrompter, the nation's largest cable TV system, by the Columbia Broadcasting System Inc., and three production companies which sell programs to the network.

After the decision was announced TelePrompter stocks rose more than one point in a generally sluggish stock market.

Abortion Consent

The court also declined to consider the rights of an unwed father in determining whether to abort a pregnancy.

The justices rejected without comment a petition for review from Florida where state courts found no paternal say in the decision.

An unwed father, identified as "Mr. Jones" unsuccessfully sought an injunction barring the abortion desired by "Miss Smith" a nineteen-year-old woman he lived with.

The Florida District Court of Appeals, drawing on Supreme Court decisions, held abortion is "purely personal to the mother."

Golda: her profile

JERUSALEM (AP) — Golda Meir, called unwillingly out of retirement five years ago at age 70 to lead Israel through some of its most turbulent times, announced her decision Sunday to fulfill her greatest ambition — to retire again and then recinded it yesterday.

See news story, page 5.

Accepted by her Labor party as a compromise candidate for the premiership after the death of Levi Eshkol in 1969, Mrs. Meir was convinced she would last only a few months until a younger party leader could be chosen.

"I don't plan a new career," she said soon after being sworn in. And she looked forward to rejoining her daughter and grandchildren on a kibbutz in the stark Negev desert.

But the short, stocky woman with worry lines cut deep into her brow became a national institution.

She led the country through a bitter two-year war of attrition with Egypt and into a precarious cease-fire in August, 1970, through a deadly underground war with Arab guerrillas, through daring raids across the frontiers into guerrilla strongholds and all-out war.

Always convinced of the rightness of her cause, Mrs. Meir states her case for Israel's right to exist with eloquent simplicity:

"We intend to remain alive, our neighbors want to see us dead. This is not a question that leaves much room for compromise."

Born in Kiev in 1898 to Moshe Mobovitz, a poor Russian carpenter, she was taken to American in 1903.

As a schoolteacher in Milwaukee, Wis., she became involved with Zionism and preached her new religion on street corners.

Ohio, coast races on today

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Voters in traditionally Republican districts in Ohio and California make their choices today in special congressional elections that may provide another clue to public sentiment on Watergate.

The races are the third and fourth special congressional elections this year. Democrats won two earlier contests, including one for Vice President Gerald P. Ford's old seat.

The Ohio race is in the 1st Congressional District, an area that has gone Democratic only three times this century. The candidates themselves have generally avoided the Watergate issue.

Judiciary may receive Nixon court data

Sirica, who turned down the White House last year in its bid to keep its Watergate tapes and documents from the grand jury, has a number of options:

—He can turn over the report and an accompanying satchel filled with documents to the House Judiciary Committee which is studying whether to recommend impeachment to the full House.

—He can order the document sealed and kept in the court's custody.

—He can make it public.

—He can order the grand jury, which has not been discharged, to make its findings part of the indictment — perhaps even naming the President as an unindicted co-conspirator should its evidence warrant it.

Special Watergate Prosecutor Leon Jaworski's office has decided that the proper forum for any charges against the President is the House. That decision avoids the court battles sure to result over the question whether indictment can precede impeachment. Constitutional scholars argue on both sides of the question.

In his White House briefing, Warren also reaffirmed the President's support for the accuracy of a statement by Haldeman that figured in last week's indictment.

One of the counts against the former White House chief of staff alleged he lied in quoting the President as saying raising $1 million for Watergate defendants would be wrong.

Nixon was asked on Aug. 22 about the Haldeman statement, made before the Senate Watergate Committee, and replied "his statement is accurate." Yesterday Warren said "I am standing firmly behind what the President said" at that news conference.

Heath resigns; Wilson to try building new government

LONDON (AP) — Conservative Edward Health resignated yesterday after 44 months as prime minister and his arch rival, Laborite Harold Wilson, took over the task of trying to form a new, minority government.

A terse Buckingham Palace statement announced Wilson's appointment as prime minister. He previously headed the British government from 1964 until Heath's Conservatives defeated elections.

The change of government became effective from the moment Wilson kissed Queen Elizabeth's hand in the private audience room on the first floor of the palace. His wife Mary waited in a room nearby.

The Wilsons drove from the audience directly to 10 Dowing Street, the residence of Britain's prime ministers. Only two hours earlier Heath had left to tender his resignation to the queen.

"We've got a job to do," the pipe-smoking Wilson told a crowd of well-wishers. "We can only do that job as one people. I'm going to do that job now."

Moving men were taking Heath's personal possessions out the vack door of the prime minister's residence. The Wilsons planned to move in Tuesday.

Three days earlier Wilson's Laborites narrowly defeated the Conservatives in national elections. They took more seats in the House of Commons than the Conservatives-301 to 296 — but neitherwon enough for a majority in the 635-seat House.

For three days Heath sought to form a coalition government, but he finally had to relinquish the government when Jeremy Thorpe's Liberals, with 14 seats, refused his offer.

It was the third time Wilson led his Laborites to victory in national elections. He was elected leader of the party in 1963, and one year later Labor won a slender five-seat majority in the House.

Wilson called new elections in 1966 and increased the margin to 100 seats, but in 1970 he lost to Heath in what was regarded as a major upset.

The top priority for Wilson's government will be the coal miners' economy. The reason Heath called elections in the first place had been to win a mandate to handle the strike, which forced him to place the country on a three-day work week.

Heath pledged that "the new government can be assured of my support in whatever realistic measures it takes in the interests of all the people."

The next task before the new government will be to seek massive laons abroad to offset a trade deficit running at an annual rate of $10 billion. Even before the election, the British treasury said the government would have to find more than $6.9 billion to cover the deficit and to meet the higher costs of oil.

The economic and industrial crises climaxed an unremitting string of setbacks for Heath's policies and for himself personally since last fall.

First his program of economic expansion began to come apart with big rises in world commodity prices. This pushed up living costs at home and generated ever swelling wage demands fom workers.

By the time the Middle East war flared last October, the country already was spending at the annual rate of $5.6 billion more abroad that it was earning from exports. Then came the huge increases in oil prices and on top of that unrest among workers in the railroads, coal mines and power stations.

After the coal miners banned overtime work last November to back their wage demands, Heath proclaimed a national emergency and on Dec. 31 he cut the work week to three days.

Europe will pursue own Arab policies

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) — The nine Common Market countries informed Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger yesterday that they are going ahead on their own with plans for a long-term cooperation agreement with 20 Arab states.

Kissinger told newsmen the United States does not "claim a veto on all the Europeans" relations with the Arabs, although it does oppose separate arrangements on oil. France had split against the eight others on cooperating with other big oil consumers, including the United States and Japan.

West German Foreign Minister Walter Scheel, who led a Common Market meeting Monday, said the European-Arab effort would include increased economic, technological and cultural cooperation. He said oil problems would not be in the foreground.

Kissinger met with the European leaders yesterday on his way home from the Middle East after a stop in West Germany. He left for Washington late Monday afternoon.

Foreign ministers from the nine Common Market nations met yesterday for the first time since their disagreement over oil, and quickly agreed to arrange a conference with the Arabs.

They also approved a draft of a proposed joint statement with the United States on economic principles.

Full approval could not be given by the British representative, Oliver Wright, because a new British government might blick the decisions. But Scheel said he thought British approval would be a formality.

Kissinger said European and American representatives would discuss the draft statement in mid-March. He reported good progress on another joint policy statement, being drafted by all 15 allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization — NATO.

He added that both might be signed on a visit by President Nixon to Western Europe-expected in April-but that a decision would be made when the agreements are completed.

NATO Secretary-General Joseph Luns said America's allies appreciated U.S. efforts in the Middle East and were encouraged by the prospects of a step-by-step peace.

NATO and the Common Market both are headquartered in Brussels.

Meir withdraws resignation; agrees to continue talks

JERUSALEM (AP) — Premier Golda Meir withdrew her resignation yesterday and will try to form a new government for Israel in the next two days, President Ephraim Katzir announced.

Mrs. Meir, who had announced Sunday she would not head the next government, agreed to continue political bargaining and try to form a government by a deadline set for midnight tomorrow, Katzir said.

"Mrs. Meir informed me to my delight that she will carry on her efforts," Katzir announced to newsmen just about 24 hours after the 75-year-old premier told her Labor alliance whe would not head the next government.

Labor party sources said earlier that Mrs. Meir had agreed to stay on as leader of Israel's next government after colleagues pleaded with her to remain in power.

"I wish her success," Katzir said in a brief statement at his presidential residence in Jersalem.

Mrs. Meir, 75, who has been suffering since the start of the year from shingles, a nervous disorder, announced her resignation after some key factions of the Labor alliance rejected her list of Cabinet nominees.

The list contained six new faces, including Yitzhak Rabin, a former chief of staff and ambassador to Washington, to serve as defense minister in place of Moshe Dayan.

Dayan's refusal to take part in the next Cabinet, in reaction to party censure of his handling of the October war, was one factor prompting her to announce that she was stepping down.

Aides said Mrs. Meir twice postponed her visit to the president's residence to allow Labor party colleagues time to convince dissident party factions, primarily backers of Dayan, to support her proposed cabinet list.

Before the Labor party sources said she had changed her mind, top ministers in the caretaker government visited Mrs. Meir at her home and, as they left one by one, glumly told newsmen she was adamant in her decision to quit.

Amid the government cirsis, Israel's military command reported that Syrian forces on the Golan Heights fired bursts of artillery at Israeli positions. The firing was the first reported since U.S. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger visited Syria last Friday night, seeking a separation of forces on the Golan plateau.

Until a new government takes office Mrs. Meir's preelection cabinet continues as a caretaker government, and one of its chief jobs will be to pursue Kissinger-sponsored negotations with Syria.

Political analysts said Mrs. Meir's resignation announcement might not harm these tasks, but infighting in the Labor party could weaken Israel's hand in bargaining with the Arabs for an over-all peace settlement.

People are rediscovering the railroads

By The Associated Press

A young Saratoga Springs man said he was afraid of planes, a Utica woman cited the "convenience and relaxation" of train travel and another woman said simply, "I love train rides."

Railroad passenger business is booming in New York State, largely because of the energy crisis.

"During the World War II war years it was like this," recalled George Myers of Buffalo, a conductor for 35 years."

"Some people are beginning to rediscover trains. Some people who haven't ridden a train for 20 years say they're delightedd Some say they'll stick with trains even after the crisis," he said.

"This energy crunch has doubled our business," declared F.B. Conners, supervisor of service for Amtrak in Buffalo. Passenger ticket sales last month totalled $36,117 compared with $18,000 in February 1973," he said.

Brian Duff, an Amtrak spokesman in Washington, said commuter patronage on the Empire Line between Buffalo and New York City was 60 per cent higher last December compared with December 1972.

"Many of the people who normally drive to New York each morning have shifted to trains because of the difficulty in obtaining gasoline in the New York City area," Duff said, adding that the most dramatic increase of passengers on the Empire Line may be from Westchester County north to Dutchess County.

A ticket agent for the Harlem Division of the Penn Central, which runs commuter trains from Dover Plains in Dutchess County to New York City under contract with the Metropolitan Transportation Authority, said business in January "increased about 50 per cent, and I would say in February about 70 per cent."

Passengers are coming to Dover Plains from as far away as Torrington, Conn., and Great Barrington, Mass., he said. And an extra car is added to all trains from Dover Plains to New York City on Sundays, when the round-trip fare is $4.50, the ticket agent said.

Frank Conte, Amtrak ticket agent at Utica, said business was "fantistic," with the largest increase coming after Thanksgiving. Allegheny Airlines had cut back on service out of Oneida County Airport, he noted.

"We went from 5 to 50 reservations in one week and we've been going great guns since," Conte said.

He also is hearing more passenger complaints.

"They expect this station to look spic and span and they want to know why we don't put on more cars to accommodate them. And we can't help but ask them where they've been keeping themselves for the past 20 years," Conte said.

In Utica, Kathleen Jones of Utica said she took the train because of "the fuel situation, the convenience and relaxation. And besides, it's cheaper."

In Buffalo, Jeffery Anthony, 26, of Saratoga Springs, was taking a trip to Albany because he's afraid of planes, he said, and train travel is "more comfortable."

"It's cheaper and for me it's more convenient," said Charloutte Gutfield, 62, who was traveling from Buffalo to her home in Newburgh. The trip by train takes only an hour more than by plan when the time spent getting from the New York City airports to Newburgh is included, she said.

Since Amtrak came into being in 1971, the basic inter-city rail passenger service in New York State has been between Buffalo and New York City with intermediate stops at such cities as Rochester, Syracuse, Rome, Albany and Poughkeepsie. There are also commuter lines such as the Harlem Division of the Penn Central.

Brief relief with shipments for March

BOSTON (AP) — Gasoline supplies have improved and are now fair in all of the New England states because most stations have received the first shipments of their March allocation, according to a special survey conducted yesterday by the American Automobile Association Clubs in New England.

Areas reporting low supplies are Lawrence and Worcester, Mass.; Providence, R.I.; Portsmouth, N.H., and Bennington and Rutland, Vt.

In New England many stations report they are limiting purchases usually from $3 upwards.

In the Boston area many of the stations contacted have extended their gasoline selling hours because of the reduction or in some instances the disappearance of lines.

The AAA survey also reported that the average price of gasoline in the Boston area has increased 4 cents to 51.9 cents for regular and 55.5 cents for premium.

More gas won't cover cutbacks

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

For some gasoline stations in Massachusetts, the "windfall" additional allocations won't even be enough to cover cutbacks announced by their suppliers, some station owners said yesterday.

John Neely of the state office of Consumer Affairs said the two special distributions of 5.8 million and 12.9 million extra gallons will amount to about a 10 per cent increase for stations.

However, the Shell Oil Co. has told its dealers they will be getting 15 per cent less this month than in March of 1973. An American Oil dealer in Chicopee said his distributor is cutting back 5 per cent on his allocation this month.

"We know their position isn't enviable," Neely said, "but it could be a lot worse."

Dr. Richard Burns, a Federal Energy Office official working with the state on the gasoline situation, said neither Shell nor Amoco has officially notified the regional FEO of a change in their distribution plans. He said the companies are required to file revisions with the regional office. Few gas stations reported any line-ups of motorists waiting for gas yesterday.

Stations in the Boston area that did have lines of from 10 to 20 cars considered that a vast improvement over the situation a few weeks ago before the state instituted a voluntary Oregon style rationing plan.

Most stations were still limiting their gasoline sales to two hours in the morning and two in the afternoon.

However, those stations warned of cutbacks in their allocations said they would be cutting back on their hours.

A Waltham Shell dealer said he has already been forced to lay off 10 employes.

Mass. Electric requests 12.7 million rate increase

BOSTON (AP) - A $12.7 million rate increase requested by the Massachusetts Electric Co. to make up for lower revenues caused by consumer conservation was opposed yesterday by public officials and private citizens at a Department of Public Utilities hearing.

The electric company, with 700,000 customers throughout the state, asked for the rate increase in January citing inflation and a "slowdown in sales" cuased by reduced usuage.

The company's associate general counsel, Philip H.R. Cahill, told the DPU yeserrday that they slow down has jeopardized "our ability to maintain good service and finance necessary construction."

But a variety of public officials, cheered on by about 250 citizens who attended the hearing, insisted that consumers will be penalized needlessly for conserving energy if the rate increase is approved by the DPU.

Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn, representing his office and the Massachusetts Consumers Council, said that "the consumer is being asked to pay double for not using electricity."

He charged the company with "serious and questionable business practices," referring to "builder kick backs" whereby the firm offers financial incentives to contractors who install electric heating devices.

U.S. Rep. Michael J. Harrington, D-Mass., said consumers, who are suffering from inflation, must be protected at the expenses of the utility company's stockholders.

"If Mass. Electric cannot provide the service it is licensed to supply at rates which people can afford," he said, "then it is time for someone other than Mass. Electric to supply that power."

A dozen state legislators, many from North Shore communities, joined the opposition. Several cited continually increasing profits for the electric company since 1969.

Several state representatives presented the DPU with petitions from their constituents, opposing the rate increase.

Cahill said that "We recognize that rate increases are not popular, either with our customers or with their elected representatives...But it was a necessary move...Otherwise we would endanger our capacity to meet our obligations as a public service company."

The company spokesman said Massachusetts Electric has economized but that it still cannot meet its financial obligations without the increase. Cahill cited the need to pay interest on the firm's mortgage bonds, interest on short term loans from banks, dividends to holders of the company's preferred stock, taxes, insurance and maintenance costs.

He said the company is "not maintaining a reasonable level of earnings on Mass. Electric's common stock and in January ran an $800,000 deficit on common stock returns.

Harrington termed the company's arguments "false," and urged the DPU stop "cheating consumers by discounting their problems when it comes time to grant rate increases."

Americans blame oil companies for crisis

NEW YORK (AP) - A majority of American families surveyed by a consumer research organization feel the oil companies bear the biggest share of the blame for the energy crisis.

Most families also believe the problem is being exaggerated and they say they are not etting accurate or complete information about the situation, said the survey which was released yesterday.

The poll was taken by the Home Testing Institute of Manhasset, N.Y., a market research organization. The institute mailed questionnairies to 500 families of different income levels, ages and regions selected from among 60,000 households on the organization's roster.

Responses were received from 395 families, but not all the families answere every question so the percentages don't add up to 100.

Among key findings:

-Almost half the families surveyed said the energy crisis had caused them to change their thinking about vacation plans and 8 per cent said they would simply stay home. Of those planning to travel, most said they would still use the car.

-There has been an increase in the number of people using car pools to get to work, but 74 per cent of the male heads of household and 70 per cent of the working wives still drive to work alone.

The oil companies and the government came in for the most criticism on the energy crisis. Sixty-seven per cent of those responding said tte oil companies were "very responsible" for the energy crisis; 26 per cent said they were somewhat responsible; and only 3 per cent said they were not to blame at all.

Turnpike revenues reduced by crisis

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Toll roads in New England have been hit with reduced traffic and revenues since the gasoline shortage began.

Traffic on the Massachusetts Turnpike span between the New York border and Route 128 outside Boston was down 14 per cent in January from the first month last year, and revenues were down more than 15 per cent.

On the turnpike extension into Boston, traffic was off 10.5 per cent and revenues 9.5 per cent.

On the Maine Turnpike, traffic declined 16 per cent in January and revenues 14 per cent.

The three turnpikes in New Hampshire reported average declines of about 20 per cent in traffic and revenues.

However, turnpike officials say they have enough money in reserve to continue paying interest on the highways' revenue bonds.

Poli-Sci twaddle

By BOB SCHEIER

To write like a political scientist, you have to learn to be able to ramble on forever and ever while saying either nothing or very little.

For instance, I can illustrate this technique by taking the above idea and expanding it into a full-size column, using the techniques I have observed in the required readings for some political science courses right here at UMass:

In tackling the writing of a political science textbook, a political science professor (those most often involved in such projects) often find themselves with very little to say; or, if they do have something to say, it will often be so obvious that steps must be taken to expand the size of the book or article being written.

This is done by several means, all of which can be combined in the same article or book. For instance, convoluted, awkwardly phrased sentences, such as these, can often be used to great effect in taking a lonely, threadbare idea and emplanting it so firmly in a forest of verbiage that the student will never be able to find his way out.

And, if that does not expand the book enough, another good trick is to simply repeat the concept again, in a different convoluted sentence, not really saying anything but sounding impressive, confusing the student, and giving the author another paragraph--as I just did here.

Another good tactic is stating obvious, taken-for-granted exceptions to the main concept and then shooting them down. For instance, I could mention here that of course you have to have a basic concept to begin with, since in most cases it is close to impossible to expand no concept at all into a lengthy book or article, while you can take a simple concept, like the one I started with, and I by now have written close to 250 words without saying anything new.

Another obvious exception is that if one can come up with any sort of a new idea or perspective on an old idea (known as a "new angle" in a news story), then the author can milk that for all it is worth and just go on and on for practically forever.

For instance, my theses is that this garbled, confusing, space-filling expansion of simple ideas often obscures the fact that the author has nothing to say, and encourages students to think in the same abstract, generalized terms as the authors. If I wanted to, in this essay I could go on and on about the subtle effects of this on a student's thinking process, on the way he approaches new problems, how he views the world about him, and how it affects the way he will view the study of political science.

Another good way to stretch an article or book is to list long lists of examples, such as political science courses that take a semester to teach you that different countries have different interests, and that stronger countries can force their wills on weaker ones; or seminars on Watergate, held by political scientists, in which nothing is said in great detail, length, and even controversey.

This process of stretching, of course, is not confined to political science.

I could go further into the subject of how political scientists talk, but since I want to graduate this spring I won't. For more information on that, consult your course schedules for next fall--or take a walk through Machmer Hall sometime.

Act on discrimination

To The Editor:

The recent events in the Soviet Union should point out that despite "relaxed tensions" with the Soviet Union, they have not changed. Can we really associate and deal with a country whose ideas are so contrary with our own without admitting that these ideals we hold are not really so important to us in the first place?

If you are against discrimination, for free speech and expression, and due process and seek to erase from our society any and all contrary example, should you not seek the same for all humanity? What is the difference betweee an American Black and a Russian Jew? Don't both have the same right to life and liberty? Or do we reserve these rights for persons born in the US, putting the other inhabitants of the world in a lower class, inferior, and therefore not entitled to the same privileges? If this is the way you feel I feel sorry for you.

Is not an American ideal that All Men are Created Equal, that everyone, every human being, should have the right to Life Liberty and The Pursuit of Happiness? We can never deal with those who oppress large segments of the worlds population, who stifle free speech, who keep a million people in political prison. Instead we should seek to cause the liberation of these people by withdrawing all support of such governments. I, for one, cannot sit by and watch other human beings being treated in such a manner..

So stay a while

To The Editor:

It is disturbing to see signs all over campus advertising vacations in "sun-filled" San Juan or "fun-filled" Acapulco at a mere $189 (and up) for 8 days and 7 nights.

It is to be completely insensitive to the Third World struggle to think that we, as North American students, would spend spring vacation in one of these Latin lands. A whole range of tourist services and Hilton Hotels await us which are either North American owned or which were built with North American capital. This touris industry has succeeded in not only physically conforming beautiful, peaceful places to a real estate agent's idea of beauty, but can be mentally destructive to vast numbers of native workers who sell their services as waiters or taxi-cab drivers or more likely as janitors and chamber maids.

If you really feel like a vacation to one of these places, why not plan it for a longer amount of time when you can learn some of the language when you will be able to give something as well as learn about a whole new culture and people. After all, apathy is one thing, but going on such a vacation would be tacit consent to the oppression on the part of North America over less developed nations.Would you be above to enjoy this kind of vacation?

Get sick on time

To The Editor:

I feel that after my experiences with the University Health Services this past weekend that it may be of general interest to the students of UMass to know that this is not the place to get injured or ill. On Saturday afternoon my roommate waited, bleeding and in pain for one hour for a doctor to come and stitch her hand. Later that same night with an ill friend at the infirmary there was one nurse present while four people were in need of help. The problems required more than a nurse, who incidently was more capable of moralizing than treating anyone.

I don't know if maybe service is better on weekdays or during the daytime: possible if you can plan your problems to suit the convenience of the infirmary you will be more successful. If you do find it necessary to become ill at off hours I hope that your problems are not too urgent — because you'll never make it.

McGilvray: sexist, crude

To The Editor:

Even if this letter does not get printed, I would like to give full support to Denny Maiteau's accusation of Don McGilvray.

As soon as something in a cartoon is depicted as racist, the editors of the Collegian immediately apologize. But if something is depicted as sexist, it somehow manages to be shoved under the table.

This cartoonist, if I can give him credit for being one, has no conception of what a woman actually is. He either portrays them either being voluptuous sex objects or as male-castrating bitches. Although exaggerations are often a way of expressing humor, I, as a woman, find his cartoons offensive and in despicable taste. What McGilvray needs is a sense of humor of which he, no doubt lacks.

His portrayals of women are crude and one may psychologically conclude that he has a terrible sex hangup and this is his only way of releasing his frustrations.

His topics seem to rely on his base knowledge and opinions of sex, drugs and racism and if this is all of which he is aware, then I feel sorry for him as a human being.

UMass students are supposed to be above the baseness of McGilvray's cartoons. I would suggest that he try protraying the lighter side of UMass everyday life in a more accurate and higher intellectual context.

But after seeing McGilvray's vain attempts of depicting humor at a higher level, it is no wonder that he has to stick to his simpleton ideas. It is an insult to my intelligence and it should be to those people who represent the Collegian and the UMass community.

The only thing I find humorous about "UMies" is McGilvray's total inability to be humorous.

Cindy Rogers

McGilvray: not racist, talented

To The Editor:

..Congratulations Donald, you did it. You finally made an administration person think and become responsive to what is going on around this place. However negative that response might be, you did nothing wrong. It is not your fault that Mr. Bromery cannot share with the rest of the campus community the laughter you bring us every day.

Knowing who you are, I believe that your cartoon was not racist in intent. I also feel that the administration should publicly apologize to you for having yourlabeled as "stupidly childish" by one of its members.

Did the English department feel insulted? No. Did Dick Mac Pherson? No. Did the Bluewall, the D.C.? No. It might be that they know something Bromery doesn't.

Donald your art captures life as you see it. It is real talent. It is your gift to all of us. Mr. Bromery overrates his political position.

Robert Paul Foynes

McGilvray: offensive, scurrilous

To The Editor:

We write with both concern and alarm at the cartoon by Mr. Donald E. McGilvray published in the Daily Collegian on February 22, 1974, a subsequent cartoon by Mr. McGilvray published in the Daily Collegian on February 28, 1974, and certain statements deriving from the correspondence and from an editorial of February 25, on the subject, which we consider to reflect a serious misapprehension of the role of the press in a "free" society and its accompanying responsibilities.

The Committee has no concern with Mr. McGilvray as a person, or with his personal views and, indeed, it is unlikely that his name would ever have attracted the Committee's attention but for his offensive and scurrilous pieces, in themselves an imposition upon the perceptiveness, intelligence and sensibilities not only of the University of Massachusetts community, but the entire Five College community. The Committee is not concerned with Mr. McGilvray's views, since a realistic assessment of social process in American society suggests that there are many Donald E. McGilvrays in this world. Rather, the Committee is astounded that Mr. MdGilvray can be allowed to insinuate his views into a newspaper that boasts of being "New England's largest collegiate daily" and which, ostensibly, provides a service for the entire University community. To compound this error, the imagination that they "will ... uphold our cartoonist's or any other person's rights to express an opinion in his own way on these pages." This statement reveals a belief, on the part of those charged with running the paper, that anyone has a right, without adducing credible supportive evidence, to have their opinions published in the paper no matter how malignant or potentially damaging to the subject. In the Committee's judgment, a duty both moral and legal, devolves upon the editors to ensure that the reverse is the case, and we make bold to suggest that the paper's legal advisers would reaffirm this position if consulted.

No on quotas

Does reverse discrimination exist in the admission policies of academic institutions in America? The Supreme Court will decide on this question in a controversial case that is bound to splash through the papers this coming month. The case: DeFunis vs University of Washington Law School. The question: Is the establishment of racial quotas in academic institutions a violation of the equal protection clause of the Constitution?

I react to this issue with very mixed feelings. On one hand I can see the validity of some of the points put forth by the defenders of racial quotas. They refer to such a policy as "affirmative action"; an active movement to diversify their student body and give a greater opportunity to "minority" students to achieve an education. The proponants of "affirmative action" tell me that "equality has to start somewhere, and minority students have to be given a chance now."

Those attacking the racial quota system, such as Marco Defunis Jr., charge that such a system is "reverse racial discrimination." DeFunis, an honor student at the University of Washington was rejected from UW Law School, even though 37 students with lower grade averages and test scores were admitted. On further examination, DeFunis was told that the 37 were admitted because they are "members of a minority group." It was on these grounds that DeFunis is suing the University; and the case seems compelling enough for the highest court in the land to consider.

In simple terms the question is this: Should a school have seperate standards of admission, one for white students, and another for "minority" students? I don't think that such a policy is just, whether it be on moral or constitutional grounds. If you accept the premise that people should be judged for who they are, and not what they are than the basic concept of racial quotas is a contradiction, and therefore unworkable.

Quotas do two things: They get people in, and they keep people out. When quotas kept minority students out (if you can ever define what exactly a minority is-for example are Jews a member of minority group?), the schools were branded as "racist". Now these same groups who called the first policy "racist" defend this new quota system as just. Somehow I can't see it.

If you go under the assumption that this new system is to "make up for the crimes of the past," you should ask yourself just who formed the "policy of the past."

The people who controlled the power structure then, still control it now. However they are not paying the price of "affirmative action." A Kennedy or Rockefeller can get into just about any school in the country because he or she is a member of that power structure. Slick administrators who push "Affirmative Action" rarely have to wonder whether their children can get into college or graduate schools. The people who are paying the price are the members of the predominantly white middle class; usually people who had little say in the policy making in the past.

I'm against racial quotas because I believe that the Constitution is color blind. People should be judged as people, and not as members of "this group" or "that sex." Your chances for reaching your maximum potential should be determined by what you know, and not who you know. I'm against discrimination on all grounds, at all times. You can't say, it is bad for this, but o.k. for that. Without an absolutist approach you get involved in the same trap concerning freedom of speech, a "who decides" what is free speech?

Things in the past were really unfair. Many people were cheated out of their best possibilities because of it. But racial quotas don't improve the system, they just appease the conscience of those who formed the previous policy. Yet these same people will never be affected by "affirmative action" in the least.

We must move towards a progressive and populist coalition that recognizes that all people have a right to get maximum exposure to academics; the right to breath clean air; eat good food; receive proper health care; and have a chance to work.

Quota systems just play the people with the least influence off against each other. Any kind of prejudice or discrimination is wrong, whether it takes place against a Julian Bond, or a yound man named Marco DeFunis.

A modest proposal

Dear Mr. Nixon:

I am quite certain that the President of the United States is as aware of the present energy crisis, as are all other loyal Americans. I am one of these fortunate individuals who does not own any formal means of oil dependent transportation.

As an avid reader of the daily press, it has come to my attention that the President frequents certain areas of the country, and of specific interest to me, the Key Biscayne area in Florida.

My sister lives in that general vicinity and it has been quite some time since I have seen her. I am sure that the President sympathizes in the separation of families. I would like, very much to visit her and seeing as the President is constantly going down there, without due reason, I wish to submit a modest proposal. The next time that you wish to visit that area of our country, would you take me along for the ride? I have no other means of getting there, and we all know of the dangers a woman might encounter while hitch-hiking.

I assure you that I would be of little bother. I don't take up much room, would provide my own lunch (I'd even make a few extra sandwiches for you and the crew), and would take the responsibility of getting to Washington, providing of course, that you would put me up for the night in one of the spare rooms in the White House, or even a couch in the Oval room if need be.

I think that the President should get himself in the habit of taking passengers with him on his excursions throughout the country. Getting around this rather large country of ours is somewhat hard, especially now, with the availability of fuel at a minimum. There are many people of whom I know that would be in need of rides to either the Key Biscayne area or the San Clemente area. If you are interested, Mr. President, I will have them get in touch with you. Or, you could always put your name up on the ride boards of the University under "riders: wanted."

Think of the fuel that people could save if you, Mr. President, would take a few along with you on your trips. Think of the great service that you would be doing for our country's energy crisis. Think of the great service that you would be doing for me and my fellow Americans. Think of the great service that the Gallup Polls could do for your popularity.

The best time for me to go to Florida is at the end of March, when school closes down for a week for spring vacation.

I'll be looking forward to our trip together.

Keep in touch.

Your fellow American,

Fooling Mother Nature

For all the supposed intelligence of college students there is nothing more amusing to watch than the annual trick of trying to get spring to happen early.

Late February and early March bring out the warm weather lovers in drove.

Shorts are taken out of mothballs.

Basketballs are filled with air after a deflated winter hibernation.

Bicycles start vying for equal space in traffic lanes.

Sometimes a coat worn in early morning becomes unbearable by three p.m.

This year there is streaking.

A few years ago there were enthusiastic marches on the capitol to save a few lives before summer.

There is always the time honored theory of a persons mind turning to love in the spring.

But this year it will be the same as always. Shorts are put away again, and basketballs go flat. Bicycles disappear for a while and sweaters go on before a coat. It will be tough to streak with snowshoes. And no one will be off to Washington, if they're ever going, until it really warm enough to stay out all night.

Love? Who knows if that is myth or not?

It's been tried before, but you can't fool Mother Nature.

The effort of Mr. Donald E. McGilvray is neither more nor less than an attempt to perpetuate a distortion of the reality concerning the proper role of Black Americans in the society and to justify the continued exploitation of Blacks by Whites.

The Committee endorses the Chancellor's statement that the original McGilvray cartoon is either "racist" or "stupidly childish"; regards the characterisation of the Chancellor's response as an "over-reaction" as outrageous impudence deriving from the amateur psychiatry which Whites are so prone to inflict on Blacks; and considers the Fishman statement as emanating from the same aforementioned propensity on the part of Whites for the amateur psychiatric analysis of Blacks, the logical culmination of which would be the assertion that 22,000,000 Black Americans are presently suffering from acute paranoia. This last is not novel, but is an argument that has been used by White America with a repetitiveness, at once depressing and dizzying, to suggest that racist outrages protested by Blacks are but the product of an exceptionally fertile imagination. Furthermore, the Committee welcomes the statement by Mr. Jerry Lazar in the March 1 issue of the Daily Collegian as being an effort to secure decency and mature judgment, but deplores the reference to ego masturbation and to the statement by Mr. McGilvray that "I don't really give a shit what the Chancellor thinks about me or my cartoons anyway" as being more appropriate to a "jock house" carnival, the latter statement, in particular, serving to provide Mr. McGilvray further mileage for his views that are, at once, an outrage to the intelligence and to good taste.

That the Chencellor of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst is a Black man is, in the context of American social institutions, perhaps a novelty — a novelty that engenders "cognitive dissonance" on the part of some. Such a development would hardly fit the stereotypes developed by Whites for Blacks for the purpose of justifying their subordination of the latter. The costs of the struggle to overcome this "cognitive disonance" as evidenced in the McGilvray and Fishman efforts ought not to be borne by the Black community, the members of which themselves have legal rights guaranteed both by the Constitution of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The Committee hopes that those who are responsible for the publication of the Daily Collegian would themselves ensure that its contents are worthy of a great university, and that they espect the legal and moral rights of others. It is the earnest hope of the Committee that constructive and intelligent self-regulation will obviate resort to the courts in what might well be, in the minds of some, a case of novel impression but, concerning the outcome of which, the Committee has little doubt. Indeed, the Committee is neither endorsing nor advocating legal action in this matter or in comparable situations that might develop elsewhere in the nation from like circumstances. Rather, it is the Committee's position that willful destructiveness of the McGilvray variety, if repeated, might in time trigger responses by affected individuals who might seek legal protection in the belief that the vicious "barracking" to which they were being subjected was neither "in the nature of things" nor "ordained by the Almighty."

Keochakian

Simon Keochakian, a UMass Counselor at the Student Development Center, announced his candidacy for the Amherst School Committee issuing the following statement:

"Public education in Amherst could prove to be both exciting and challenging during the next few years. A new administration should be looked upon as an opportunity to assess what has gone on in the past and to plot bold, new steps for the future. The people of Amherst have long been strong advocates of education and have given generous financial support when asked to do so. This is readily apparent as we view the modern physical facilities in town.

However, there seems to be an increasing attitude that we are not getting the most for our educational dollar. The increasing number of dissatisfied indivuduals suggests that the quality of the system does not equal the level indicated in the publicity generated by the administration. One gets a nagging feeling that all of the transfers into private schools cannot be attributed to an elitist attitude. It is very likely that the number of actual transfers to private schools is exceeded by the number who may wish to do so but are prevented from doing so because of financial or philosophical reasons.

An effective School Committee is one which is willing to confront such an issue directly. However, this can be more readily addressed if there is broad community support. At a time when we need them most, the various Parents Councils are relatively inactive or ineffective. Such a phenomenon can be easily brushed aside by stating that it is an indication of disinterest on the part of parents, but I as a parent, find this hard to believe. I would suggest that this lack of participation comes more from a feeling of futility in that an individual's comment is not valued. Unfortunately, that has been all too true in the past. An effective School Committee must aggressively rebuild its credibility with the community and function as agents of its constituency. When this spirit of collaboration has been achieved, the community can then, through its designated representatives, develop a broad philosophy which meets the needs of this community.

Kojolan

Gabriel Kojoian, a candidate for the three-year seat on the Amherst School Committee, issued the following statement:

"Why do we send our children to school? What do you view as the purpose and function of the public school system?

(a) Is it to solve societal problems?

(b) Or should its emphasis be to help the student develop as an individual?

"The fundamental effort within the educational process should be the attempt to develop and enhance the degree of confidence in the individual's decision-making abilities, so that he-she may effectively confront situations present and future. To this end, the learning of basic skills and emphasizing the rigorous disciplines are essential. Social relation-type courses must never be promoted at the expense of basic education. We owe the students more than the "now."

"The myth that an open-ended financial commitment is essential for quality education must be challenged. Substantial, periodic, precipitous increases in the school budget, without the corresponding broadening of the tax base, has helped to diminish the attractiveness of Amherst to middle-income families.

"To help reverse this trend, the School Committee should review the contents and direction of the current and projected school programs with the purpose of developing priorities in the budget.

"Further, a clear public declaration that increases in the school budget will be allowed only to the extent of meeting the needs of inflation, will help to reestablish the effectiveness of the School Committee as a policy-making body."

Quinton

Professor Arthur Quinton of the UMass Department of Physics and Astronomy is a candidate for a three-year term on the Amherst School Committee. This semester he is teaching Physics 162, a course on electromagnetism taken largely by engineering majors.

Mr. Quinton is from a North Sea fishing family and after obtaining a bachelor's degree in 1944 he was commisioned in the Royal Navy at the age of 20. Following WW II he worked as an industrial physicist and as a school teacher before entering Yale as a graduate student. He then taught at Yale for nine years and at Florida for three years prior to coming to UMass.

His research in nuclear physics is currently being carried out at the Australian National University and also the Oak Ridge National Laboratory in Tenn.

As a candidate for the office of school committeeman he plans to support the following policies:

1) Reduce the amount of money spent on administrative costs by abolishing, for example, the position of assistant superintendant.

2) Encourage principals to take part in classroom teaching so as to build a better rapport with the students.

3) immediately equalize athletic budget allocations between males and females.

4) Encourage more intramural sports, perhaps at the expense of varsity sports.

5) Continuously evaluate the physical condition of school children and look for better methods of improvement.

6) Support affirmative action programs modified to include age as part of the desired staff diversity.

7) Look for better age distribution among the elementary school teaching staff.

8) Increase the vocational training component of the curriculum for all students.

9) Use the various citizens' groups to help teachers devise curricula.

10) Retian teachers to take care of students with handicaps and disabilities.

UNH president resigns to head up Union College

By DAN FORBUSH
Editor
The New Hampshire

DURHAM, N.H. — University of New Hampshire President Thomas N. Bonner, 50, said late yesterday he will leave that university to take the presidency of Union College in Schenectady, N.Y.

Speaking confidently, he told the University combined student and faculty senate at its regular Monday meeting that his resignation will be effective June 30, 1974, three years to the day after the beginning of his term at UNH in 1971.

He then returned to his office to make the same statement to waiting newsmen.

Bonner said personal reasons and the attraction of a "new professional challenge" at Union are his main reasons for leaving UNH.

He mentioned a "general sense of exhaustion".

"The years at UNH for all the excitement and change they have brought, have taken a heavy toll," he said, "and I sorely miss the kinds of intimate friendships and clos contact with students and faculty that are possible in a smaller academic community."

When Bonner replaces Union president Harold C. Martin this summer, he will take command of an institution of 1,900 students, compared to the 15,000 graduates and undergraduates of the University of New Hampshire system.

Bonner, 51, took over as president at UNH in 1971. His leadership has been criticized by some politicians and the conservative Manchester Union Leader.

A native of Rochester, N.Y., Bonner was graduated from the University of Rochester in 1947 and earned his doctorate at Northwestern in 1952.

He left academic life briefly in 1962 to run in Nebraska as a Democratic candidate for Congress. The next year he served as a legislative assistant to Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D.

From 1963 to 1968, Bonner was professor of history and chairman of the history department at the University of Cincinnati. He served as vice president and provost at Cincinnati to 1967.

Bonner's announcement did not come as a shock to most of the University. His change of position had been hinted at by a Sunday story in the Boston Globe. Union College named a press release on the naming of a new President to a number of news outfits including the Associated Press.

The AP apparently ignored the March 5 release date and broke the story for afternoon papers yesterday, according to Union director of public relations Phil Johnson.

The campus buzzed with the news of Bonner's incipient resignation message by early afternoon.

"I would like to express my appreciation for what President Bonner had done in his three years here," said Provost Eugene Mills. "He has brought vigor strength and imagination to his work at the University."

Pressure from state officials and critics had nothing to do with his decision to leave New Hampshire, Bonner said.

"We have overcome our critics and obtained the largest increase in state appropriations in recent years," Bonner said.

Bonner added that he has no ill feelings toward New Hampshire or "the people who have been critical or harsh in their judgments" of his administration.

Amnesty bill gives hope to Americans jailed in Turkey

ANKARA (AP) - An amnesty bill now before Parliament may present some hope of freedom or reduced sentences for most of the 35 Americans jailed in Turkey on drug charges.

The amnesty, legal experts said yesterday would cancel or reduce sentences of 29 Americans serving or facing 2½ to five years for possession or use of narcotics. But six serving sentences of 10 years to life for smuggling drugs would not benefit from the bill.

Although Washington is pushing for reduction of the heavy sentences imposed on the four young men and two girls, it is also trying to persuade Turkey not to permit resumption of poppy growing, formerly the source of much of the illegal opium entering the United States.

Turkish officials view the two U.S. positions as contradictory. Turkey gave up most of its poppy production in June 1971 under anagreement with the U.S. government. The United States agreed to contribute $35.5 million to ease the financial burden from the curtailment.

Now it is generally believed in Ankara that poppy production will be resumed despite U.S. objections.

The Turkish government claims the growers are suffering economically. Diplomats say that the new left-of-center government of Premier Bulent Ecevit is embarassed to have the United States or any other country dictate its agricultural policy.

Ecevit made broad promises during his election campaign to help poor peasants, and poppy growers are among the poorest.

The 47-year-old Ecevit also promised the amnesty now before parliament, primarily to free about 2,000 political prisoners. These intellectuals, writers, educators and students were jailed under martial law during a period of riots and demonstrations that unsettled Turkey from 1970 to 1972.

If the amnesty bill passes, drug users and possessors, along with some common criminals, will benefit. Terrorists, drug smugglers and traffickers and an assortment of hardened crinimals will not.

Among the six Americans not touched by the proposed amnesty are: Kathryn Zenz, 28, of Lancaster, Wis; Joann Marie McDaniel, 30, of Salem, Ore., and Robert Ernest Hubbard, no fixed address.

Boston Repertory

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Repertory Theatre announced it received two grants to help renovate a building into a new theatre it plans to open late this coming spring. The theatre will be at 1 Boylston St., in the theatre district near the Colonial Theatre and the Massachusetts Bay Transportation Authority Boylston Street stop.

A theatre spokesman said The Committee for the Permanent Charity Fund gave $10,000, and The Cabot Foundation gave $5,000 toward a goal of $25,000 to renovate the building into theatre, offices, costume shop and scene shop.

The repertory company is leasing the building for a possible occupancy of seven years. The building formerly housed a recording studio, and before that, a nightclub. The theatre will seat more than 200 persons and have a three-quarter thrust stage.

"After much searching, this is the only space that suits all our needs," said Esquire Jauchem, managing director of the company.

ABCC outlives need

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The state Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission ABCC has outlived its usefulness, says Gov. Francis W. Sargent.

"It is absurd to think that the ABCC is enforcing a minimum price law in Massachusetts," Sargent said in an interview here Sunday.

"I can't understand why there is a minimum price law and I can't see why the ABCC is enforcing it," he said.

Sargent also criticized a credit law that prevents licensees from purchasing liquor from wholesalers if their bills haven't been paid.

Newspaper price hik

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) - The Springfield Union and the Daily News increased their prices Monday to 15 cents each.

The papers cited "constantly rising costs" for the price hike, the first in over four years.

The Union was the last morning paper in New England to sell for a dime.

The daily papers are owned by the Newhouse Chain, which also owns the Springfield Sunday Republican.

The Republican's price will remain at 25 cents.

Truck hijackings

WOBURN, Mass. (AP(— One truck driver was abducted and released and another was missing in two separate apparent hi-jack incidents yesterday.

A driver from Waterloo, Iowa, was grabbed at gunpoint when he reached the Rath meat packing plant at Woburn's industrial complex. He was freed some two hours later at an Everett playground near Boston.

The truck and its contents, some $50,000 in meat, were missing.

Richard Rose, 33, of Woburn was reported missing while driving a truck loaded with electronic equipment valued at $750,000. The equipment was en route from Medford to Cleveland for exhibition at the Pittsburgh Conference of Analytic Equipment.

The equipment was owned by the Digilab Co. of Cambridge. Digilab Service Manager Allen Weldon said Rose and the truck were due in Cleveland Saturday night or Sunday morning.

Fatal apartment fire

CHELSEA, Mass (AP) — One victim remain unidentified Sunday after a weekend apartment house fire that killed four persons.

Police said Sunday they still had not established the identity of one of the victims, a woman. The other dead were identified as Frederick Fox, 63, Victor Rodriquez, 37, and Victor Hermett, 45, all residents of the building.

Seven other occupants of the four-story brick building and four firefighters were hospitalized.

The cause of the blaze Saturday remained undetermined. Fire officials said the damage could be as much as $100,000.

Hospital discounts

SPRINGFIELD, Mass. (AP) — Two insurance companies have agreed to a plan under which Mercy Hospital patients can receive 2 per cent discounts for bills that are paid within five days, the hospital said yesterday.

Joining in the plan are the Massachusetts Mutual Life Insurance Co. and Aetna Life and Casualty Co.

Mercy said the discount is available to all "self-pay" patients and to all others who have unpaid balances on their accounts.

The same offer was extended to Massachusetts Blue Cross last year, Mercy said. Blue Cross declined to participate.

The plan grew out of a dispute between Mercy and four other hospitals against Blue Cross.

Jr. college closing

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Cambridge Junior College will close May 18, another victim of financial problems in the academic community.

The 40-year-old private liberal arts and business training school has been operating with a deficit doubling each year, Dean Denis Frauenhofer said.

In the last two years, enrollment dropped from 120 to 60 students.

Frauenhofer blamed the administration of president Harold D. Talbot for failure to recruit students and promote the school.

Talbot declined to discuss the school's closing.

"We have posted notice internally, but we have no public statement. I have nothing more to say," Talbot said.

Tanglewood concerts

PITTSFIELD, Mass. (AP) — The Boston Symphony Orchestra plans to hold its traditional 10-week summer concert series at Tanglewood, the arts center in Lenox, this year despite the energy crisis.

The season will begin July 5, according to BSO Manager Thomas D. Perry.

Perry said advance ticket sales and plans by the Berkshire Hills Conference, a county tourism promotion agency, to maintain a free telephone service listing information on gas and accommodations, played a key role in the decision to hold the full season as usual.

Cafe accident

CHELSEA, Mass. (AP) — One man was killed and two were injured when a portion of the cement facing on a Chelsea cafe toppled to the sidewalk, according to Chelsea police.

Dead was Dominque Matys, 53, of Chelsea. In satisfactory condition at Massachusetts General Hospital was John Marotta, 58, of Chelsea. Walter McKay, 57, of Chelsea was in guarded condition at Chelsea Memorial Hospital.

Night seeing device aids blind people

BOSTON (AP) — A military device used by battlefield soldiers to convert night to day has proved successful in aiding persons with blinding eye disease to see in dim light.

Initial studies involving 50 patients at the Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary proved so successful that field studies with prototypes soon will begin, and the developer hopes to have a marketable device ready in less than two years.

The light amplification device was developed for the military over the last eight years by International Telephone and Telegraph Corp., and the Army Night Vision Laboratory in Fort Belvoir, Va.

The amplifier was used by night patrols and air rescue teams in Southeast Asia and attracted the attention of Dr. Eliot L. Berson of the Boston hospital who thought it might be useful to patients with retinitis Pigmentosa.

Berson, with Arnold R. Rabin and Leathem Mehaffey, III, says studies show that the devices amplify light sufficiently to give the patients with this disease the quivalent of their best daytime vision under dim to poor light conditions such as moonlight.

Retinitis Pigmentosa is a hereditary, progressive eye condition, affecting tens of thousands of Americans, which usually leads to almost total blindness over a period of years.

The retina, an extension of the optic nerve in the back of the eyeball which sends sight signals to the brain, contains light receivers called rods and cones. The rods are the eye's night-time system that recognize dim tones and the cones see brighter lights, natural or artificial.

Forms of retinitis pigmentosa impair both rods and cones, Berson says, but the effect is more pronounced in night vision because there are 16 times more rods than cones in the eye.

"The contribution of this device is that it can amplify light enough for abnormal cones to work, as well as normal cones and rods working in dim light," Berson says.

"Because the device can be set for varying degrees of amplification, it can help people for many years up until the most advanced stages of the disease," he continues.

Berson, head of the Infirmary's Laboratory for the Study of Retinal Degenerations, emphasizes that the devices do not cure the disease and must be prescribed by specialists according to each patient's needs.

Closing of RR lines would cause layoffs

BOSTON (AP) — Abandonment of 1,400 miles of railroad lines described in a federal report as "potentially excess" could have a severe effect on New England's economy, state officials said yesterday.

Widespread layoffs were predicted at a hearing on a U.S. Department of Transportation proposal for reorganizing seven bankrupt railroads in the northeast and midwest.

In Massachusetts, the report found one-third of the state's track to be potentially excess — prime candidates for abandonment if the floundering railroads are reorganized into a profitable Consolidated Railroad Corp.

But Gov. Francis W. Sargent told the Interstate Commerce Commission hearing that "clearly" these lines are not excess.

"These lines alone are serving industries employing almost 35,000 people. If that service is cut, one-third of those jobs will be lost," Sargent said. "And when one considers the ripple effect in the state's economy, up to 25,000 workers could find themselves out on the street."

The transportation report considered only the railroads' profitability, the governor said. "It did not consider the impact of these rail lines on the overall economy."

The report described 400 miles, or 49 per cent, of the railroad track in New Hampshire to be potentially excess.

"No more serious threat to our economy has emerged than the recommendations in this report," said Commissioner George Gilman of the New Hampshire Department of Resources and Economic Development.

"A survey of medium and large employers in our state shows that more than 2,000 jobs would be endangered by the loss of rail service, and another 26,000 would be affected," Gilman said. "This amounts to more than half the manufacturing jobs in New Hampshire."

Gilman called the federal proposal unacceptable. "It is inadequate. It is wrong in concept. And Gov. Meldrim Thomson and others representing New Hampshire will fight its implementation at every step."

One of the losers under the tentative reorganization would by the Boston and Maine Railroad. The Department of Transportation found several of its branch lines to be excess and urged that its main line across northern Massachusetts be downgraded to a branch.

However, the bankrupt line has gone to court to try to keep from being included in the rail reorganization.

Benjamin H. Lacy, a B&M trustee, predicted that unless there is a major recession in 1974, the railroad "will be in striking range of a breakeven operation, before fixed charges, this year.

Wart Day is here!

WART DAY was celebrated this month at the Health Center of Central Michigan U. with the introduction of liquid nitrogen to remove the pesky pimples.

The benign tumor is said to occur most often among young persons in the mid-teens to mid-Twenties age range, the CMU Life reveals.

The CMU Health Center has been experimenting with "cyrosurgery" on the high incidence of cases they see.

WHO NEEDS GIRLS? Not the 900 men who voted recently to keep their Wabash College the all-male institution it has been for the last 141 years.

TOMBSTONED HEADLINES in the Denver Clarion provide new fodder for journalism profs who are trying to impress upon their students the "no-no" of placing headlines of the same size and intensity on separate, adjoining stories.

Page 7 of a recent edition of the Colorado campus paper ran a story about a history prize being offered for the second year by the local American-Hungarian Alliance. Immediately to the right of this two-column piece, the Clarion editors placed a single-column dispatch from the College Press Service which told of the hazards of being a trash collector in America.

The resulting headlines, run side by side, were: "Contest offers prizes" and "Garbage!"

IFF'N THAT DOESN'T GRAB YA, The Northeastern News editors put this head on an opinion piece: "Morticians stiffen in energy crisis."

AND IF YOU'RE STILL NOT CHUCKLING, the M.I.T. Tech recently covered their announcement of the revival of the campus humor magazine under this umbrella headline: "VooDoo revival, other disasters reported in news (?) article."

Discriminating gas methods filed in House

BOSTON (AP) — The Massachusetts House admitted a late-filed bill yesterday to prohibit discriminator practices by gasoline stations.

At the brief, informal session attended by a handful of members, the lower branch also admitted for consideration a bill to exempt religious organizations from reporting features of the new lobbyists' control law and a measure to re-establish the traditional police-fire entrance examination on a local level.

RFK Library papers tell LBJ's civil rights position

WALTHAM, Mass. (AP) — Vice President Lyndon Johnson urged the late President John F. Kennedy not to file his landmark civil rights legislation in June, 1963, and told an intermediary the proposals would not be approved.

Ironically, Johnson-alone among top Kennedy officials to recommend delay on the legislation-proved correct in his evaluation, and ended up shepherding the omnibus bill through Congress himself in 1964 after Kennedy's death.

Johnson's attitude came to light last week in a June 4, 1963 memorandum from Norbert A. Schlei, an assistant attorney general in the Kennedy Administration, to Atty. Gen. Robert F. Kennedy, the President's brother.

The document was one of about 10,000 of Robert Kennedy's papers opened to the public at the Kennedy Library, located here at the Federal Records Center.

Johnson, according to the memo, told Schlei that adequate legislative groundwork had not been done on the civil rights bill.

Johnson told Schlei that the legislation would be "disasterous for the President's program."

Nevertheless, Kennedy filed the bill June 19, after a television address June 11.

The legislation-which followed avoting rights proposal by Kennedy in February, 1963-dealt with desegregation of schools and public accomodations and fair employment standards.

Although Kennedy officials had almost definitely decided to file the legislation in June, 1963, a series of violate racial confrontations in Southern states early in the month hardened that decision-despite Johnson's misgivings.

The Schlei memorandum said Johnson showed strong support for the civil rights legislation. Schlei reported the then Vice President "grasped the flag beside the desk" and said that the President "might have occasion at any time to order Negro citizens of this nation to die in a foxhold in some foreign jungle for this flag, and yet on their way to die for this country those Negro citizens would not be able to go into a public lunchroom in the state of Mississippi and have a cup of coffee."

But Johnson said time was needed to get solid Republican support, plus a unified endorsement from "Negro leaders." Johnson also proposed a "declaration of support" from the three ex-Presidents then alive-Hoover, Truman and Eisenhower.

Johnson urged President Kennedy to speak on the legislation in the Southern states "on the moral principal involved." And he suggested parliamentary maneuvering in Congress to make sure the civil rights legislation ended up before a sympathetic committee.

Johnson asked for 15 minutes to make his case to the President, but apparently he was denied.

Johnson eventually used this proposed legislative approach on the civil rights measure when he became President.

The Schlei memorandum alluded to a meeting of top Kennedy officials a few days earlier. At the earlier meeting, there was apparently unanimous agreement that the legislation should be filed immediately.

Johnson told Schlei,as reported in the memo,that he had said nothing at that meeting "because by speaking out he might have created problems for the President with some of the legislators who were present," and, that if word leaked out that he was opposed, the press would brand Johnson "anti Negro."

Metcalf reading

The poet, novelist and critic Paul Metcalf will read from his work tonight at 8 p.m. in the Grace Church Parish Hall on Spring St. in Amherst.

The great-grandson of Herman Melville, Metcalf has published three novels ("Will West," "Genoa," and "Patagoni") and numerous shorter works in magazines and anthologies. He studied with Charles Olson and Conrad Aiken and played an active role in the writing and events that grew out of the historic Black Mountain College. He has been acknowledged as one of the major writers of this country by such figures as Robert Creeley, Jonathan Williams and Charles Olson.

The reading is part of the ongoing series of Tuesday Night Readings sponsored, as a community project, by Orchard Hill Residential College at the University of Massachusetts with the cooperation of the Arts Extension Service of the Division of Continuing Education of UMass.

There will be an informal discussion following the reading. The public is invited and asked to participate.

"Tout en francais"

AMHERST, Mass. — "Tout en Francais," the French program broadcast over radio WFCR (88.5 FM), will be shifted to Tuesday and Thursday nights at 6:30, beginning tonight.

The half-hour program includes interviews, book reviews, and music.

"Tout en Francais" features music popular in France and Franch-speaking Canada; interviews with French and Canadian entertainers, actors, and artists; critiques of recently published French books; and monthly reviews of the French and French-Canadian press. French-speaking people including students and faculty members of the Five-Colleges have also been on the program.

Piano recital

Music for solo piano will be featured in Fernande Kaeser's recital at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium Wednesday.

On the program will be two preludes from Bach's "Well Tempered Clavier," two of Schumann's earliest works, "Fantasiestucke Op. 12," and "Abegg-Variations, Op. 1," and Cesar Franck's "Prelude, Choral et Fugue."

Fernande Kaeser, a Swiss native, has studied at the Music Conservatory in Vevey, Switzerland and has won several international competitions including those at Zurich and Munich.

Before joining the UMass music faculty in 1969, she toured throughout Europe and the United States. The concert is open to the public without charge.

UMass summer school

UMASS Summer School, 1974 will be housed at Orchard Hill this year. There will be one session of eight weeks duration and will run from June 24 to August 16.

Students interested in serving as Residence Hall Counselors for summer school may obtain application forms from Paul R. Appleby, Assistant Area Director for Orchard Hill. He is located at 103 Grayson House and will be responsible for the Summer School Program on the Hill. Application forms and related materials must be completed and returned to Appleby on or before April 1, 1974. Materials received after that date will not be considered.

Baha'i colloquia

The UMass Baha'i Association is offering three, one credit, colloquia on "The Baha'i Faith" this semester. They will be held at 7:00 a.m. on Tuesdays at Orchard Hill, Wednesdays at Northeast, and Thursdays at Southwest. Registration is still open. For specific information phone Philippa Biggers at 6-6797, or Barry Magnus at 549-3949, or the Academic Affairs Office at one of the three areas.

The three colloquia are identical, and will include eight units of two classes each on topics such as: "Cycles of Civilization," "Faith and Self," "Religion," "Law," and "The Baha'i Faith: An Overview." Included are handouts, a media presentation, and a required book that will be distributed in class. Reflection, questioning, and discussion are encouraged.

Study in England

The deadline for application to the Oxford Summer Seminar has been extended to March 15th because of the long January break. The Seminar provides a chance to earn academic credit for a course taught by an Oxford don. This year the program offers several interdisciplinary courses that would be helpful to students in art, sociology, philosophy, and history.

There are a few places left in excellent courses, both literature and sociology. Students live in an Oxford college for the summer. Students have free time to travel both before and after the seminar. Graduates and undergraduates of all majors are welcome to apply. For details student may visit the English office in Bartlett Hall, room 160.

Meditation course

THE CENTER FOR THE INTEGRATION OF ACADEMIC AND MEDITATIVE DISCIPLINES AND PROJECT TEN are offering a 1 credit colloquium in meditation in the form of an intensive weekend workshop, beginning Friday, March 15 and ending Sunday the 17th.

The workshop will be led by Lock Rush who has long experience with Zen and spent two years doing LSD therapy at the Maryland Psychiatric Institute. Both beginners and experienced meditators are welcome. For further information call the CIMAD office on any weekday afternoon, 545-2166.

Your Head

Professor is subject of sexual fantasies

By DR.'S ANDREW W. McCASHIN AND STEPHEN M. KLEIN

Q. I am currently involved in a relationship with a boy who is my peer. For me our sexual relations are adequate; sometimes great, sometimes bad, mostly average. My problem is that I create sexual fantasies about one of my professors (he is in his early thirties-not a father image). I enjoy weaving this imaginary saga. Some amount of fantasy is normal, I know, but I worry about this one's extra "affairial" aspect. Also it can have, at times, an adverse influence on my role as student. Should I worry about this, or simply accept it as the way life is?

A. Your question contains several elements some of which are clear others less so. The sexual relationship with your boyfriend sounds reasonably satisfactory. Fantasy life (sexual and otherwise) is an important experience for all of us. It serves as an important source of gratification. People need to abandon the ego directed or task oriented focus in their lives to "play" through imagination. Fantasy is the wellspring of creativity and is a way to "rehearse" and prepare for future possibilities. Past and present difficulties can be worked through by fantasy. Fantasy becomes a problem when it loses it's "as if" quality and is acted upon as though it actually represented reality. Fantasies about having an affair with someone older, and particularly someone in a role of authority (teachers, doctors, employers) are not very unusual. Such fantasies allow one to feel more "grown-up" and mature while feeling safely dependent at the same time.

The concern you express about the extra "affairial" aspect of your fantasy life and how that affects your "student role" is a bit confusing. Being involved with someone can't be expected to prevent you from being attracted to other men or even from having sexual fantasies about them. If, however, such fantasies are constant and unrelenting, it may well be that you are less happy with your current relationship than you think. If you feel that you are experiencing some "adverse" effects either in your relationship or in satisfying your goals as a student then you might find a consultation with an M.H. staff member helpful.

CONFIDENTIAL to "Seriously Anonymous": The "medical" condition you describe is a naturally occurring situation, and does not indicate any patholigical state. Feel free if you have any other questions to consult a UHS physician.

Send, bring or call in your questions and comments to 303 Machmer Hall or 545-2337. All inquiries are confidential.

Amherst Action

Amherst College Action Coalition will hold a public meeting tomorrow at 7:00 in 209 Converse Hall (Amherst College).

Discussion will center on the possibilities of organizing a 5-college co-operative effort to sponser speakers, obtain films, form a study group on American Labor and Socialism, and establish an inter-college radical political network.

Dear Aggie...

By LAFILLE SANSMARBRES
MDC Staff

(Do you have an academic, social or personal problem? Tell it to Aggie, The Collegian*'s exclusive columnist. Send or bring letters to The* Collegian, Student Union Building, UMass, Amherst, 01002 -- editor)

Dear Aggie,

As you are well aware, streaking has become quite the pastime for college students. All of my friends are encouraging me, but frankly, I'm embarrassed. This is bound to become a big issue. I'll be chided and cajoled. How can I overcome my inhibitions?

P.S. I don't have an extraordinarily beautiful body, a source of my inhibitions...

Thanks,
Forever Inhibited

Dear Inhibited,

To streak or not to streak; that is the question, eh? If you're sure you want to be a streaker, then you should have no problems. It seems to me that in reality you are in doubt. If, in fact, your doubt lies only with your being inhibited, then that is something only you can deal with. Don't listen to your friends, for it may just be that they are encouraging you because they want to say that they know a real live streaker. Have your friends streaked themselves? If not, then why not all do it together some night? Being with your friends may ease your "inhibitedness" which does seem to be the root of your problem. If you can get over being inhibited, then you can have a good time and run free!

And remember, it's not the body that counts, for looks are nothing! It's the principal of the thing. Our society has taught us (unfairly and with much conservativism) that the human body is disgusting and should be covered to be beautiful. Well, now we're finally breaking that archaic code of ethic. We all know the body (any-body) is a beautiful sight, and there should be no reason why it can't be seen as it is. There's nothing to be ashamed of. Everyone has basically the same thing. Why discriminate? If streaking is what you want to do, then go right ahead! Do your thing and be not ashamed of that work of art that makes you YOU!

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

A survey of thousands of horoscopes reveals that famous French scientists and physicians were born when Mars was coming over the horizon. Writers, painters and musicians were seldom born at this time. Politicians were born with Jupiter rising, but scientists seldom have Jupiter in this sector. No famous French writer was born with Saturn on the Ascendant.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Accent on change, creativity, intensified relationship. Element of timing is in your favor. Dramatic flair comes to fore; personal magnetism soars. Popularity increases. You receive meaningful compliment. Be confident!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Home, security, installment payments--these are likely to be featured. Stick to the basics. Review plans, ambitions. Relations with parent or other authority figure command attention. You find out what means the most to you--and what to do about it.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Bright spots appear where, in recent past, there was gloom. Visits, calls are featured. Ideas click. Change of scenery could be on agenda. Laughter is here and so are new, vital social relationships. You are going to be more optimistic!

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Money, payments and collections are featured. Special hobby provides creative outlet and can be profitable. Know it and proceed accordingly. Taurus, Libra persons could be in picture. Avoid eating too many sweets. This is more important than usual.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Take initiative. Vitality makes comeback. Ambitions are crystallized. You get clear view. You perceive potential and can do something about it. Perfect techniques. Rehearse and review. Television appearance could be upcoming.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): What occurs is likely to be obscured, behind the scenes. You may be visiting hospital or institution. Courtroom also could figure prominently. Law and confinement dominate. Freedom could be temporarily restricted. Capricorn, Cancer persons are involved.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Spotlight is on friends, desires, reward as result of professional endeavors. You have more appeal. You are able to reach more persons. Those you respect take you into their confidence. You have chance now to make important points. Do so!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Be direct. Get to source. Skip clerks, middlemen. Reach one in authority. You can obtain green light. Be persistent. Leo, Aquarius persons could figure prominently. Welcome challenge. Impress superiors. You will be in line for reward, promotion.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Favorable lunar aspect now coincides with publishing, communication, long-range plans and travel. You are able to glimpse future. You perceive potential and what to do about it. Aquarian plays key role.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Lunar position emphasizes funds, research, savings, taxes, dealings with legal counsel. Key is flexibility. If stubborn, you pay a price. If versatile, you can come to constructive understanding regarding costs, legal settlement.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Dig deep for information. Avoid being in too much of a hurry. Give attention to statements by partner, mate, others close to you. Someone wants you to know--if receptive you will add to your knowledge. Aquarius and Leo persons are involved.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Ask questions designed to improve service. Give full play to intellectual curiosity. One who is concerned with your health deserves a hearing. Respond in mature manner. Don't permit wishful thinking to displace logic.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are inquisitive, persistent, attracted to lively people who travel and write. You are attractive to opposite sex, poetic and able to express yourself in interesting manner. June should be your most significant month of 1974. Persons born under Gemini and Virgo are drawn to you.

Johnson has plenty Sox to choose from

By DAVE O'HARA

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) - The Boston Red Sox-long noted for good hitting, bad pitching teams-are trying to go the opposite way this year in hopes of quitting the brides-maid role in the American League East.

Playing 81 games in Boston's chummy Fenway Park, and its not too distant fences, the Red Sox are gambling on pitching after finishing second in the division the last years.

General Manager Dick O'Connell went into the trade market vigorously. He acquired veteran infielder Dick McAuliffe for young Ben Oglivie from Detroit, but proven pitching was his goal.

When the wheeling and dealing had finished, the Red Sox had Dick Drago from Kansas City; Rick Wise, Reggie Cleveland and Diego Segui from the St. Louis Cardinals, and Juan Marichal from the San Francisco Giants.

Marichal-with 238 victories, the biggest winner among active pitchers-was picked up for a bundle of cash. The Red Sox are hoping he still has something left at the age of 36.

With Luis Tiant 20-13, Bill Lee 17-11, young Rogelio Moret 13-2, veteran reliever Bob Bolin and a flock of young prospects battling for pitching berths with the newcomers, the Red Sox are happy.

"I'm very pleased with what we have to work with," Johnson says. "We think we have the best pitching here in years. Things should be interesting in spring training. I'll carry no more than nine pitchers, the nine best."

Veteran Carl Yastremski remains the team's best long ball threat, although he hit only 19 homers last season. Rico Petrocelli had only 13 homers in 1973 when he finally had to submit to elbow surgery, creating a third base problem.

All-Star catcher Carlton Fisk led Boston last year with 26 homers, but he had only eight with a .196 average in the second half.

Johnson, who stresses defense to help the pitchers, insists he will field the best players from what they do in Florida. Yastremski carries both a first asemen's mitt and an outfielder's glove.

However, the betting is he'll be at first opening day. Doug Griffin is set at second and Petrocelli at third. Shortstop Luis Aparicio, who will be 40 next month, faces a stiff fight despite his $100,000 salary.

Many observers fear Aparicio has slowed down too much and Johnson will go with rookie Rick Burleson or Mario Guerero. Burleson started for Johnson at Pawtucket in the International League last season, while Guerrero saw part-time duty as a Boston rookie.

Veteran Tommy Harper, who hit .281 and led the league with 54 stolen bases in 1973, figures to be the regular in left, with young Rick Miller replacing Smith in center. Carbo will battle Dwight Evans, a young inconsistent slugger, for the right field berth.

Orlando Cepeda, who batted .289 with 20 homers and 86 runs batted in as the designated hitter, is back, gimpy knees and all. He may have to prove to Johnson that his slugging is more valuable than his liability on the base paths.

Long night for cheerleaders

By MIKE BROPHY
MDC Sports Staff

The UMass cheerleaders ended up spending last Wednesday night in the Enfield Jail after running out of gas in a mall parking lot in that city.

They had driven down to Fordham University to cheer the Minuetmen on to their 93-66 victory and set out for home with a 3-4 full reading on their gas gauge, Sue Cirkl said. However, upon nearing Enfield the gauge took a dive for the E.

The day had started out with their departure from Boyden Lot at 3:30 that afternoon and saw them get lost in the jungle of Manhattan, thus arriving at Rose Hill just in time for the National Anthem.

They had reportedly begged gasoline on three separate occasions and had received some, although at exorbitant prices, Cirkl said.

The cheerleaders were followed by policemen, harrassed by old men, and otherwise humiliated in their efforts to support the UMass basketball squad that infamous Wednesday night.

After landing in the Enfield cell block for the night they attempted to contact someone at UMass for help but were unable to do so at that hour of the morning.

Lorraine Harvey, Sue Cirkl, Donna March, Anne Novak, and Johnetta Bagby and loyal fan Adian Doherty were the women who suffered through this unusual chapter of the sporting experience in following the Minutemen.

Sue Cirkl, one of the six UMass cheerleaders who spent a night marooned in the Enfield, Conn. Police department, will be at the N.I.T.

Letter to the Sports Editor

Roitman returns blast

To The Sports Editor:

In response to a response to my letter of February 26, I have a few points to bring to the attention of Mr. O'Conner.

It is obvious that you have missed the point which my comment was intending to make. Although I repeatedly made mention of the fact that not all those present were at fault, and that it was not my purpose to snatch any credit away from the team, you seem to have overlooked this. My major purpose was simply to make a few people stop and THINK about the nature of a sporting contest in that it involves opponents, and that when one of the opponents suffers degradation or humiliation, then perhaps the true nature of that which we call "sport" has lost some of its meaning. My contention was not that the players were guilty, but that it became an obsession to some people for us to score 100 points after the outcome had been decided. Why 100 points can be equated with a well-played game, as you seem to believe, Mr. O'Conner, sure is a mystery to me.

Also, am I supposed to justify what we both feel is unsportsmanlike behavior with your rationalization that "what can you expect from a campus this size?" No, I don't think so. In addition, you might try sounding out some of the players' reactions to my comment. I have.

There is one thing on which we do agree, however. That is, I guess that from a campus this size, I should have expected at least one reply such as yours.

Thank you.

Phil Roitman

The Hacks get the ax

AMHERST (API) - Dave Leibel, sports editor of the Massachusetts Daily Collection, announced yesterday numerous personnel changes in an effort to make his department "big-time."

Leibel stated at a press conference: "In order to upgrade the sports staff, we've decided to get rid of some of the dead wood and replace it, via deals with other newspapers, with the best journalistic talent possible--sportswriters or otherwise."

The first victim of the massive house-cleaning was assistant sports editor Nuclear Powers, who was fired. The abrupt dismissal left a bad taste in Powers' mouth, whose parting shot was, "You won't have my captions to kick around anymore."

His replacement is a young, unknown cut-line writer by the name of Cap Shun. Leibel remarked that Shun is also "superb at headlines."

Other additions to the staff included columnists Jim Murray, Ray Fitzgerald, and Art Buchwald. Leibel lured them to the paper by offering juicy increases in salary and promising that they would't have to work layout.

Another top acquisition, Howard Cosell, will also be paid generously, but will have to do layout Monday nights.

"He doesn't have much newspaper experience explained Leibel, so he'll start from the bottom."

The ambitious sports editor also said he had Ernest Hemingway lined up to write this semester, but did not elaborate on how he rose him from the dead.

To make room for the new blood, wrestling writer John Botch, track writer Snot Haze, aging veteran Pearle Barrel, and basketball writer Steve DeCaustic were placed on waivers.

The only one to be claimed by another newspaper was DeCaustic, who interested the Muncie Junior High Gazette. The wheelin' and dealin' Leibel then withdrew DeCaustic from waivers and instead sold him to the Gazette for a sum of 50 typewriter ribbons.

Though Botch's and Haze's careers seem ended, Barrel hopes to hang on as a free-lance layout man.

Baseball writer Mike Atrophy was given an unconditional release.

Gone through trades were columnist Bill Ballyhoo, gymnastics writer Candy Growth, and reporter-at-large Glenn Posterity.

Ballyhoo was dealt for Clark Kent, a mild mannered reported for a great metropolitan newspaper. When contacted at his office in the Daily Planet, and asked his opinion of the swap, Kent beamed "Super, man!"

Growth was traded for that great storyteller as well as writer, Ann Ecdote.

Meanwhile, Glenn Posterity went in a multiple deal. He was carted off to the National Enquirer in return for two thesauruses (thesaurii?) and a dictionary to be named later.

Leibel canned all staff photographers, commenting, "they can't even develop a picture unless they use a Polaroid."

"I asked Howard to bring three ABC cameramen with him, anyway."

When questioned on the status of the remaining staffers, Leibel said flat out, "I've fired all but one. I'm fed up with them. They practically never get their articles in on time, and when they do, I wish they hadn't."

The editor, worn out from twenty-four hours of hard-line bargaining and visibly sweating from the television lights, had started to leave the press conference when a score of microphones were shoved in front of him.

The media wanted to know who was the one staffer he didn't get rid of.

Leibel smiled and said, "Of course, it's Sleeze Saracheentzie. He's nationally known for his JV basketball writing, and a great columnist as well. Even with our new writers, he's still tops around here."

"I just can't say enough about him".

Television has big influence on sports

EDITOR'S NOTE: In this second of five-part series on the economics of pro sports, an Associated Press sports writer looks at television's impact on athletics and how it influences the sports world.

By FRANK BROWN
AP Sports Writer

All evidence points toward the fact that television is the largest single influence in sports today.

National Basketball Association Commissioner Walter Kennedy recalls, "When I was first interviewed for this job in sports today.

National Basketball Association Commissioner Walter Kennedy recalls, "When I was first interviewed for this job in 1963, the first question the owners asked-before they even wanted to know how much salary I wanted-was, "Do you think you can get us back on national television?"

The answer, of course, was yes. "I immediately turned my attention to national television, and in the next three or four months put us back on the ABC network," Kennedy said.

The contract called for 16 games to be telecast during the 1964-65 season at a fee of $600,000-equivalent now to the cost of three commercial minutes on the Super Bowl. Last summer the Columbia Broadcasting System purchased the NBA rights for three years at $9 million per year.

Things were no different in hockey, baseball and football, where television made its most staggering impression by bringing the American Football League from the brink of oblivion to a merger with the established NFL.

"There's nobody, I think, who could quarrel with the fact that the National Broadcasting Company's investment in the AFL put them in business, made them a competitive fator, and forced the merger" says Carl Lindeman, Jr., a vice president of NBC Sports.

"The commitment was $42 million. It was for five years, but it was lots more than twice what the AFL had been getting from ABC at that point.

"But quite apart from the money," Lindeman continued, "we gave them network exposure, committed ourselves to doing all the games-carring them back to the home markets.

New England mat wrapup

Weak schedule didn't hurt wrestlers

By JOHN BOCK
MDC Staff Wrestling Writer

HANOVER, N.H. - There is always the perennial discussion about scheduling and what it can do for a team's performance. The usual axiom is "You migrate to your competition." The UMass wrestling team tarnished that rule when they defended their mat title by tying the University of Rhode Island in the NEUWA Tournament.

"It isn't always who you wrestle but how you wrestle at the end that determines who is the champion," mused Coach Barr after his team made a come-from behind victory.

URI had wrestled a far superior schedule this past season and looked to sweep the tournament as they had six men in the finals. In the end, four of the six were in the runner-up position while four out of five UMass finalists were wearing gold medals.

After Larry Reynolds pin over Adham of URI in the finals at 118, Rhody made it one for two as top seeded swifty Scott Pucino manhandled BU's Mat Thomas 6-0 at 126 for his second New England title in as many years.

It was UMass vs. BU in the finals of the 134 pound weight class. Russell Chateauneuf had done the improbable-gained the finals after being laid off for a year with injuries. In his freshman year he won the varsity NE's at the same weight but a bad knee forced him to sit out his sophmore year. After a dismal dual match season at 142 Chateauneuf dropped to 134 to see, in his own words, "If I am as good as I was my freshman year." His opponent in the finals was Sev Popolizio, the top seed at the weight class and a very quick, smooth wrestler. They tied the regulation bout at 5-5 after numerous single-leg takedowns. They tied the overtime bout 1-1 by virtue of an escape and penalty point. In this case the champion is decided by a vote of the referee and two mat judges and they decided unanimously in favor of Chateauneuf.

The finals at 142 were also BU-URI but this time BU won big as freshman Guy Bercier pounded top seeded senior Joe Savino, 20-3 for the title.

In the 150 pound class Tom Kryzak of BU broke his hand in the second period but otherwise had no trouble in disposing URI's Dave Hovey, 2-1.

Steve Benson won the New England title that he had pursued so rigorously (he wrestled the whole season at 167 and dropped for the New England's) but didn't really wrestle to his potential. He had two pins going into the finals but had to settle for a muscular and methodical 10-5 decision over BU's Paul Donovan. Takedowns, escapes, and some back points were characteristic of Benson's final match.

Jim Urquhart of URI defended his 167 pound title as he squeaked one by Dartmouth's Kevin Young by a score of 5-3. Boston U claimed their second and last champ at 177 as Mark Jones lived up to his top seed by beating fourth-seeded Rick Clark of Dartmouth in the finals.

UMass made it to the finals at 190 as freshman Robin Osborne pinned last year's 177 pound champ Stu Horowitz in the semi-finals and gained the finals against top seeded Chuck Estin of Dartmouth. Estin brought some impressive credentials with him, winning the World Maccabian Games held last summer plus being a two-time placer in the New Englands before. Osborne shot a quick double leg and lost it. He came back, tied up, shot and found himself wrapped in a cradle and pinned in :59 of the first period.

As the finals droned on and on it became increasingly clearer that the Minutemen had closed the gap that separated them from URI. In fact, if Dennis Fenton pinned or scored a superior decision over his opponent UMass would win; a win would tie, and a loss would send URI home with the trophy. The pressure on Fenton was immense because not only was the team title at stake but the fact that he had never beaten Ray Miro of URI loomed in front of him. The first period Fenton demonstrated what having the best heavyweight coach in the East can do for one as he mopped up the mat with Miro, scoring eight points on him and holding Miro scoreless. The second period he rode him out and the third period he gave up three points but still scored the big 12-3 decision that UMass needed. Not only had they not walked away with the tournament as predicted but they failed to convert four of six finalists to champs while UMass collected the largest number of champs they had ever had.

In competition for the Junior Varsity New England Title, UMass little Minutemen placed second to URI, crowning two champs, a runner-up and four thirds. Steve Ruggeri at 118 and Al Elmont at 142 were JV Champs while Gregg Tallon was second at 134.

Thirds for UMass were Tom Smith at 167, Paul Masi at 177, Greg Scanlon at 190 and Steve Swartz at Heavyweight. Special mention goes UMass' Dave Schutt who upset the second seed at 142 to break up the weight class for Elmont. Also Swartz's 16-second pin was the fastest pin in either tournament but didn't qualify him for the Fastest Pin Trophy.

Two women seniors conclude basketball careers tonight

MARILYN RITZ

By LINDA MACKLER

Tonight marks senior Marilyn Ritz' last regular season varsity basketball game. Since transferring from Bristol State College her sophomore year, Marilyn has been a stronghold on the team. Now co-captain with Heannie Abrahamson, Marilyn reminisces about her three years at UMass:

"There has been a great improvement in the team," she said. When I first came here our record was 1-10. We were all first year players. Now that we have worked together for so long, our experience shows."

According to fellow players and Coach Jane Farr, Marilyn's ability is a significant factor in the improvement. Teammates feel that Marilyn is a leader on the floor and off. Center Pat Glispin thinks that Marilyn has developed her self-cinfidence.

Pat said, "Marilyn knows what she can and cannot do. She keeps the game moving and the team together. We look to her to set the pace and control the tempo."

Coach Jane Farr agrees. "Marilyn is the floor general," she claims. "She has excellent reflexes and quick hands. The team will definitely miss her next year. We need her out there."

Although Marilyn fooled around with a backyard basketball hoop, she didn't play organized ball until her junior year in Westport High School. On transferring to UMass, she immediately joined the varsity team. Most of her career has been spent at guard, but she has also played forward.

"I like playing guard better," she said. "You are the person passing instead of receiving. You also avoid the contact under the basket."

A Physical Education major, Marilyn hopes to teach and coach following graduation. She intends, to become involved with organized women's teams.

Marilyn is a mature and likeable player. As teammate Chris Basile says, "Marilyn speaks quietly, but her action and abilities make her presence known."

Debi Stoll is another player seeing final action tonight. Center for the junior varsity team, Debi has played basketball since she was a freshman at North Middlesex Regional High School in Townsend.

Also a transfer student, Debi played one year of varsity ball at Asbury College, transferred to UMass, and broke her foot. She has played two years at UMass.

A physical Education major, nicknamed "Frip" for an expression she uses when she makes a mistake, Debi plans to "teach, coach, and continue playing basketball as long as possible."

Debi started out as a forward, but is glad with her change to center. She plays competively and aggressively. She is a good rebounder and a good team player.

"I like it at center," she stated. "Although there's a lot of freedom at forward, there's a lot of responsibility at center."

Seven new teams added to NIT

By JOHN NELSON

NEW YORK (AP) — Seven more schools — including Maryland-Eastern Shore and Cincinnati, last week's upset victor over 11th-ranked Marquette, have accepted berths to the National Invitation Tournament, the NIT committee announced Monday.

"We've got it, we've got it," cheered an exhuberant John Bates, coach of Maryland-Eastern Shore, at 26-1 the winningest college basketball team in the nation.

"It's a great feeling," said Bates, whose team is an NAIA member but decided this year to participate in the NIT rather than the NAIA regionals. "This is what we've been after. This campus is in a state of bedlam." It's the first time the school has been to the NIT.

Others accepting bids to the post-season tournament at Madison Square Garden March 16-24 were Rutgers, 18-7, Utah, 19-7; Boston College 18-8; Fairfield, 17-8, and Connecticut, 18-7, said Ken Norton, vice president of the NIT committee and athletic director at Manhattan College.

Cincinnati, 19-7, defeated than eighth-ranked Marquette 92-77 Saturday to clinch its invitation to the NIT. The Bearcats, who also have beaten No. 18 Louisville twice this year, are led by 6-foot-5 Lloyd Batts, averaging 21 points a game.

Batts' brother, Boyd, is a starter for the University of Hawaii, one of four teams picked earlier to compete at the NIT. The other earlier selections were St. John's, N.Y., Manhattan and Massachusetts.

Five more teams will be named later, filling out the 16-team contingent to compete in the tourney.

Rutgers, making its fourth NIT appearance, is led by 6-5 sophomore Phil Sellers of Brooklyn, N.Y., with a 23-point average. Sellers was the Most Valuable Player in the All-College Tournament.

Utah, making its seventh NIT bid, is averaging 90 points a game.

Connecticut Coach Donald "Dee" Rowe says the invitation is "the beginning of the culmination of a lifetime dream for me.

"I have been in basketball as a player and coach for more than 30 years and have always dreamed of receiving the opportunity to participate in a national tournament," Rowe said.

GOP loses again; blamed on Nixon, Watergate

By BILL VALE
Associated Press Writer

CINCINNATI, Ohio (AP) - Democrat Thomas A. Luken defeated Republican Willis D. Gradison Jr. in an Ohio congressional election Tuesday. Republican leaders, some openly and some privately, blamed Watergate and President Nixon for the defeat.

Voters in the traditionally Republican 1st District turned their backs on the Republican candidate for only the fourth time this century.

In 1972, President Nixon polled 67 per cent of the district's vote, and William J. Keating, whose resignation created the congressional vacancy, polled 70 per cent.

It was the third Democratic victory in three special congressional elections in the country this year. California voters were deciding a fourth on Tuesday.

With 458 of 478 precincts tabulated, Luken had 53,121 votes, or 52 per cent, while Gradison had 49,262, or 48 per cent.

Election officials estimated the turnout was about one-half of those eligible to vote.

Earl Barnes, Hamilton County Cincinnati GOP chairman, wouldn't directly blame the defeat on Watergate. He said Gradison got Republican votes, but added: "There are approximately 123,000 independent voters in the district who generally vote 62-65 per cent Republican. This is where we lost...the breakaway. They voted for the Democrat. Obviously, the Washington thing was the factor in losing the independent vote."

Barnes said, "We'll have to do a lot more careful analysis of the voting..before anybody can say whether Watergate really was an issue in this election."

The Republican state chairman, Ken McGough, said in Columbus before the votes were tabulated that he doubted Gradison could win. He said registration favored Luken. He was reported to have said privately that Nixon's handling of Watergate was a critical element.

In Washington, the White House declined comment on Luken's victory.

The race for the seat was between two former Cincinnati mayors who did not make Watergate the major issue. The tipoff came early in the tabulation when one suburban Cincinnati precinct went Democratic for the first time since 1900. That precinct went to Luken.

Gradison conceded his defeat at 9:10 p.m. EDT Tuesday when just a handful of precincts were untabulated. He said Watergate was one of many factors in the election, but said his defeat was "just the first round."

Luken's term will run through 1974. Luken is unopposed in the Ohio May primary for the seat he won Tuesday night. Gradison will have opposition in the Republican primary for the seat.

Sid Weil, Hamilton County Democratic chairman, said the major issue was not Watergate, but the economy.

English head resigns but will still teach

By BARBARA VOORHEES
Staff Reporter

English Department Head Joseph Frank has announced his resignation effective June 1, 1975.

"Joe" Frank says that he is neither frustrated nor disgruntled with his job as head of the university's largest department but after six years in the position he feels he has done most of the things he wanted to do.

"I love Amherst, UMass and the English Department but I don't want to be department head any longer says Frank. "I want to go back to being a teacher and a scholar and let some fresh blood in to take my place."

Frank was offered a deanship at another university but he turned it down. He will remain at UMass as a professor and plans to write a few books and travel when he can.

Associate Head of the English Dept., Ernest Hofer who has worked with him every day since Frank came to UMass in September, 1969, said that he will miss him because of his "enormous administrative abilities and his utter reliability in every situation."

Hofer also remarked, "We have 110 members in our department and Joe knows them all and has an idea how they feel about department matters."

Director of Undergraduate Studies in the English Dept. James Leheny said, "I think department morale has been exceptionally high during Frank's administration and his generous good nature has contributed significantly to this. I hope his successor can have as good a rapport with as many people as Joe had."

Professor Howard Brogan, former head of the English Dept. said, "I can understand Mr. Frank's view that six years is enough. It was a busy six years with a lot of changes. I haven't gone along with all of the changes but most of the staff has."

Changes which Frank has seen in his department include growth in the areas of film, folklore, women's studies, journalism and OUTREACH programs; reform of the PhD. program and the development of dozens of new courses.

Frank says that during the time he has left as department head he will continue to fight for some changes including the abolishment of the rhetoric requirement per se, unionization of faculty and expansion in the areas of interdisciplinary programs, team-teaching and OUTREACH programs.

Says Frank, "I guess from now on I'm going to be a lame duck but an obstreporous lame duck."

Caucus turnout 'embarassing'

By SHERM BOYSON

Voter apathy was the real winner in the Amherst Town Caucul held yesterday. Only 682, or 7.5 percent, of the town's 9,087 registered voters bothered to go to the polls.

The caucus is the primary election in preparation for the Town Election to be held April 9th. By town law, the caucus has to be held when there are more than two candidates running for a single post. The caucus is used to narrow the field of candidates down to the top two vote getters, who then compete against each other in the Town Election.

this year, only one office had more than the minimum of two candidates trying for it. Town officials cited this as the reason for the poor turnout.

Five candidates were trying for the two positions available on the regional school committee. The caucus had to be held to condense the field to four candidates. The winners were: Maris Roverts (412), rovert Fisher (311), Simon Keochakian (220), and Arthur Quinton (164). Gabriel Kojoian was eliminated with only 82 votes.

The turnout was one of the worst in the history of the caucus. One worker in the Town Clerk's Office commented, "we were embarrased when the turnout was only 19 per cent." A large turnout was not expected, but neither was an extremely small one.

University of Massachusetts students were very rare sights at the polls. It was estimated by the workers at the precinct polling places that only 10 students who live on campus. there is no way to determine how many off-campus students voted, as no record of whether a resident is also a student is kept.

Students comprise as much as much as 20 per cent of the registered voters in some precincts. One worker commented, "The students are not really interested in local affairs. When the presidential election was held, the line stretched down the street. A student doesn't really care who gets on the school committee, and who doesn't."

the election scene now turns to the April Town Election where offices of Selectmen, Town Moderator, Town Meeting Members, Housing Authority Members, as well as others will be decided.

Free food, but still no Patty

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — More than 30,000 persons carried away sacks of free food distributed at the demand of Patricia Hearst's kidnapers Tuesday, while Gov. Ronald Reagan urged Californians to pray for the young woman's safe release.

The massive People in Need food giveaway seemed to be reaching an air of normalcy with recipients filing through quickly and quietly.

"It is developing its own momentum," said organizer A. Ludlow Kramer, Washington secretary of state. "Our operation is getting smoother, but we still have to do a better job for the community."

Kramer said he would expect Miss Hearst to be released because the food program is meeting the demands of the terrorist Symbionese Liberation Army. Kramer noted that $4 million more has been pledged to People in Need on the condition that the newspaper heiress is first released unharmed.

Reagan, noting the widespread concern for the young hostage's welfare, proposed two days of prayer.

"No one can fail to be moved by the anguish that this tragic situation has meant for Miss Hearst and her family," Reagan said in Sacramento.

"So I ask every church and temple and citizens of all faiths to make this weekend a time of prayer for the safety of Miss Hearst and her quick return to her family," said the governor.

He has said law-abiding citizens should reject food demanded for the poor by the armed guerrilla band holding the 20-year-old coed.

But throughout the San Francisco Bay area, young and old streamed out early to get their share of the third massive People in Need handout. The giveaway is funded by $1.5 million from the William Randolph Hearst Foundation and $500,000 from the victim's father, newspaper executive Randolph A. Hearst.

The distribution was reported orderly at the 12 centers prepared to feed about 35,000 persons groceries that included frozen chicken, bread, milk, oranges, onions, chili and cereal.

CEQ deplores nuke proposals

By SUE ADLEY

The UMass "Coalition For Environmental Control" recently released a position paper calling for a moratorium on nuclear power plants. Excerpts of the position, adopted on Feb. 19, follow:

"The Coalition supports a moratorium on the construction and the operation of nuclear power plants. We maintain that the current state of technical development of nuclear fission power reactors is neither clean, safe, nor econmical."

"Nuclear power is 'clean' only if clean is defined as the absence of smoke, ash, or other by-products which we as human beings can perceive. Radiation, however, cannot be felt, seen, smelled, or tasted, though its damage is real, nonetheless. The routine radioactive releases to the air and to the cooling waters of nuclear power plants (which contain isotopes such as Strontium-90 and Iodine-131) are biologically concentrated in organisms and are re-concentrated up the food chain to higher animals where they do damage to tissue cells. For some radioactive substances, we know the danger and the organs affected."

"It would be a dangerous policy to assume that other radioactive substances released, do not have similarly damaging effects. The highly radioactive, long-lived wastes (some are active for thousands of years) are even 'dirtier' in the sense that they can cause extensive loss of life and genetic damage if leaked by a breach of the containment vessel at a power plant or by leaks in the waste storage systems."

"The safety of nuclear power plants is in grave doubt. Whereas the Atomic Energy Commission (A.E.C.) relies on computer models to accurately describe the basic safety system of a reactor (called the Emergency Core Cooling System - E.C.C.S.) all small scale tests have failed! Thus, we have systems which are proven failures, 'protecting the public from one of the most deadly technologies ever developed. Reassurances based on estimates (such as 1 in 10,000 or 1 in 1,000,000) based on guesses should not be relied upon."

"Problems of sabotage are also becoming increasingly likely with the proliferation of nuclear power plants...We conclude that the current state-of-the-art is insufficiently developed to warrant proliferation of nuclear power plants when evaluations of cost, safety, and environmental contamination are considered. We recommend placing nuclear power plant technology back into research programs to be developed sufficiently to protect public safety, to prevent environmental contamination, and to be truly competative, economically, without massive government subsidies."

Ranan Cohen, a Coalition member, said that their position is not just in opposition to nuclear fission power. It just gives alternatives. Cohen also said that a conference on alternate energy, similar to the one the Coalition held last semester, is a possibility for the near future.

The Coalition is looking for support for their position from the UMass student body. A table will be set up in the CC Concourse Thursday, manned by members of the Coalition, with petitions ready to be signed.

IT'S DAYS LIKE TODAY THAT MAKE THIS A DOG'S LIFE!

Sheehan says BHE needs replacement

By MARK VOGLER

BOSTON — The administration of higher education and human services in Massachusetts is misguided and geared to "those who are only interested in earning more money," former state Commerce Commissioner Carroll P. Sheehan said Tuesday.

Appearing as a guest on WUMV's Telopolitics, (to be shown in the Campus Center Concourse level today, 11:30-12:30), Sheehan said the Board of Higher Education should be eliminated and that mental and correctional institutions could not be closed on a "mass basis."

As a challenger to Gov. Francis W. Sargent for the Republican nomination in the September primary, Sheehan cited commerce as the key to his platform.

He announced his candidacy last week after contending that a "hostile economic climate" has hindered employment in Massachusetts.

Sheehan criticized the educators of the state for approaching their job without facing the "relevant issues."

"The entire Board of Higher Education should be replaced — they're all bent in a direction I don't want to see us going in," he said.

"You just can't talk about education without mentioning issues such as racial imbalance...it will mean the death of the city of Boston if this is not changed."

He said he opposed the "wode-open" autonomy of any institution of higher learning, and added that the educators are not providing the citizens with "essential services."

"The problem is that the goals of the Board of Higher Education are not the same goals as Massachusetts residents, and I think the people of this state are disgusted with the quality of education they are receiving," Sheehan said.

Efficiency in the area of Human Services is impossible, he said, "because the people in charge are not administrators, but social scientists."

In what he referred to as the "great job of miscasting," Sheehan said the social scientists are attempting to close down institutions with "coming to grips with the real problems."

The state has an obligation to the institution and to the family of each resident to work within the system's famework, he said.

"It's costly...it's got to be costly, and the state has to do it, " Sheehan said.

"We have to begin to deliver the services. Maintaining our institutions is necessary. To close them and put the residents in halfway houses on a mass basis is not the answer."

Sheehan charged that the Sargent administration is interested in putting people on wlfare regardless of need, but is not interested in new jobs in the state.

As Governor he said he would encourage the people to be less dependent on government and more dependent upon themselves.

"We can't make an econony work if we don't have private enterprise...the creation and holding of jobs is my most important priority," Sheehan said.

He said a balance should be drawn between social programs and taxes which would attract new jobs to the state.

Sheehan criticized Sargent for "brow beating" Energy Chief William Simon when no information was available on the amount of gasoline and fuel oil supplies coming into the country.

"Mr. Simon certainly isn't sitting there wondering about how much gas he can give Massachusetts," he said.

"Even today nobody knows for sure what the story is. It's a very complicated problem of dealing with the multi-oil companies.

He said Massachusetts was "at the end of the pipe" in receiving supplies, but did not put the blame on the Sargent administration or accuse the Nixon administration of intentionally discriminating.

Sheehan said he would comply with all campaign expenditure laws but would not make other personal finances public.

He added he would not participate in a campaign monitoring project sponsored by Massachusetts Common Cause, and suggested they should study the Governor's pay raise over the last three years before checking the finances of another candidate.

The 48-year old Milton resident resigned in 1971 from his state Commerce post over disagreements with Sargent. He later served as regional director of the U.S. Department of Labor before becoming vice president of Beacon Construction Co. of Boston.

'Piano-Plunker' Blake going strong at 91

"My mother used to say, 'you ain't gonna be nothin' but a piano plunker'," Eubie Blake told a packed Emily Dickinson lounge during his hour-long performance there this week.

The 91 year old ragtime pianist, composer and vaudville performer arrived at UMass March 2nd. and is staying until March 6th through the Orchard Hill (OH) Academic Affairs Office and the Orchard Hill Music Series.

"No wonder I can't get a girl. Who wants a guy 91 years old," Blake told the audience after Max Roach of the Music Department left out Blake's age in his introduction.

He then began his performance with the "Charleston Rag." Blake composed this in 1899, the same year Scott Joplin wrote "Maple Leaf Rag."

"Boy, if I don't say what I got to say right away, it's gone," Blake explained as he inter-mingled stories with his piano playing. He told how people ask him why Black pianists tend to play the black keys. "Down south you can't strike the white keys," he explained.

Jesse Ricket's "Dream Rag," Cole Porter's You Do Something to Me," and a James P. Johnson medly of "Charleston Dance," "Old Fashion Love," and "If I could Be with You Tonight," followed, intermixed with other stories.

In 1973-74 Blake said that he had written six rags and six waltzes. He played his most recently written waltz, "Valse Marion" which he said he wrote for his wife and manager, Marion. "Troublesome Ivory" written by Blake rounded out the first half of the program.

"I could see once, you know. Don't think I've been old all my life," Blake said upon returning as he searched a piece of paper to see what he was to play.

He played the "Classical Rag" and then launched into a story of his vaudville days and how he and his partner, Noble Sissle, finally came to play the palace in New York City, the height of the vaudeville circuits.

"You play the Palace and then you die and to heaven for there's nowhere else to play after the palace," he said. He explained that he and Sissle used to perform at all the sophisticated parties.

"We played for everbody, leaving out the Rockefellers and the Fords. They didn't give any parties that I know of."

Blake wrote the music for fourteen Broadway shows in the 1920's and 1930's. He played a medley from his first one, "Shuffle Along" in 1921. It was a medley of "Bandana Days," "Love will Find a Way," "Gypsy Blues," and "I'm Just Wild About Harry."

"I'm Just Wild About Harry" was used by Harry Truman as the theme song for his Presidential campaign. Blake explained that when he originally wrote it, it was an untitled waltz.

He was forced to change it to it's present one step form when the star of "Shuffle Along" said she wouldn't sing it as a waltz.

Blake next performed an arrangement of Richard Wagner's Pilgrim's Chorus from "Tannhauser." This was followed by Blake's "Memories of You", which was sung by Miss Bernice Hall. Blake explained that Miss Hall, a resident of the Amherst area, was the second person ever to sing this song.

Blakes piano arrangement of "Memories of You" and a ragtime version of John Philip Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" rounded out the performance.

Alan Davis, Academic Officer of OH, told the Collegian that the efforts of Reggie Workman, Archie Shepp, and Max Roach of the University faculty, and John Betsch and Alden Griggs, professional musicians helping to co-ordinate the OH Music program, helped bring about Blake's performance.

Joseph Baron, co-ordinator of the OH Music Series, has been accompanying the Blakes during their stay at UMass. He told the Collegian that the Blakes have been an "absolute pleasure" to be with.

He said that Eubie Blake "just tells stories and he tells them in such a way that they seem like yesterday and when you ask him when it happened he says 1903, 1904."

Baron said that the only place on campus Blake remembers is Blaisdale House. Staying in the Campus Center Hotel, Blake passes Blaisdale House everyday and calls it the 100 year old house and remembers it because it's older than himself.

Baron said that the Blakes have gone at their own pace while on campus. When they arrived Saturday night, March 2nd, they felt like meeting some people, Baron said, so an impromtu reception was held by Alan Davis.

On Sunday, March 3rd, Blake performed at the Amherst Nursing Home. Mr. and Mrs. Blake taped an interview for Black Mass Communications on WFCR with John Betsch of WFCR, Max Roach (Music Dept.), and Bill Hasson of Student Activities.

Baron said he also had a reception at Chancellor Bromery's house on Sunday and a cultural dinner run at and by Grayson House.

Mr. Blake has talked and performed for students in Dr. Fred Tillis' Jazz Workshop, Dr. Horace Boyer's Afro-American Vocal Course, and Max Roach's percussion course yesterday afternoon.

Baron explained that the major problem the coordinators of Blake's visit have had was with facilities for his performance. He said that the Student Union Ballroom (SUB), Campus Center Auditorium (CCA), and Bowker Auditorium are the major places for performance on campus.

"The SUB and CCA are ugly and really not worthy of someone of this stature to the people up here (OH). Boker is a very difficult place to be booked into. So, we're here (in Emily Dickinson lounge). It gives intimacy and atmosphere but it doesn't give us number," Baron said.

Backstage: earnest and important

By BONNIE COHEN
MDC Staff

"Every color makes me look orange".

"I think that red lips look funny".

"I'm scared to death to do anything......."

With just a little more than an hour before curtain time, the actors, actresses, designers, directors and a myriad of other people associated with the show were running around backstage getting ready to do what they had been practicing for weeks.

"Where's Narya?"

"Getting the champagne ready for the cast party ".

"What cast party?"

The party, held at the home of director Marya Bednerik, was to be a grand finale to the opening night of the University Theatre's production of "The Importance of Being Earnest."'. The play, which was billed as "a trivial comedy for serious people" had a cast composed entirely of students.

"Where are the costumes?"

"Don't worry, they're not supposed to arrive until seven o'clock."

"But it's seven-twenty now....."

Paul Tauger, the stage manager, ran around backstage, nervously checking to make sure that everything ran smoothly. Anxiously, he tried to calm everyone down.

But as professionally calm and collected the actors and actresses appeared, they could not forget that they were still students. Hidden beneath the lipstick, cold cream, bobby pins and wigs were copies of Chinese textbooks and physics notebooks. "I'm not on until the second act and there's plenty of time to study before....."

An interruption — "Hey listen everyone, the 11:15 discussion group of Theatre 115 wrote us a poem." The actress had a chance to practice her histrionics as she read aloud the poem which measured "the earnesty of being important".

The costumes finally arrived. The self claimed "friendly and amiable" stage crew moved between the corsets and frock coats trying to get things ready.

Malcolm Turner looks over a copy of The Boston Traveller announcing memorial services for President Lincoln. The paper is one of hundreds of items at Turners Treasures.

The older the better

By LARRY CARPMAN

If you ask Malcolm or Hope Turner what's new they will always say "nothing." Everything new to the Turners is old.

Malcolm and Hope Turner are antique dealers and proprietors of Turners Treasures, an antique shop in downtown Amherst. The shop is completely full of antiques and collectables some of which date back to 1764.

Hope, wearing an ancient looking pin with an American flag encased in glass, said she gets much of the store's merchandise from buying out people's attics or houses.

"Since we've had the shop we get about two calls a week to buy items in someone's attic," she said. The shop has been open since October 1973.

She pointed out that some people get upset when they are told their items are worthless. Meanwhile she said: "we have gone back and given people more money for an item if we find out later on that it is older and worth more."

Turner said at first she was not sure how students would react to an antique shop. "I was impressed at how the students seem very knowledgeable about antiques," she said.

"My first customer was a Hampshire College student, she said, and he bought a Spanish mantilla (a scarf worn over the hair and shoulders). "The triangular shaped blacklaced item she described was first worn in 1840.

"Now who would think a young man would buy a lace mantilla," she said.

"I notice a certain trend with students," she said. "They're going back and would like to preserve history."

On one cluttered wall was a copy of the Boston Traveller citing the various churches holding memorial masses for the assasinatior of President Lincoln. The newspaper was torn and brown-edged but still had clear print.

"People will collect anything from buttons to tin cans to postcards," she said.

"The general public is much more aware of the value of antiques now," she said. "Possible, it's because there are more antique shows and more adds for antiques."

She noted the busiest time for antique dealer is tax season. "People need money around this time so they'll sell their attics," she said.

Turner described what she called "one of the most interesting items" the shop has had.

"It was an Indian peace pipe from around 1850," she said. Indian things don't stay here too long they're very collectable."

In this area items pertaining to Mt. Tom Reservation are popular with natives and dealers, Turner said.

"A 15 inch vase with a picture house on Mt. Tom is the most beautiful local item I've ever seen," said Malcolm Turner.

Turner, a 51 year-old small-framed grey-haired man who is also a full-time clothing salesman in Amherst, said: "A lot of people think antique dealers are shysters, but they're actually very fine people."

"I've always been a collector, Turner said, there are a lot of people who are like this."

"I never thought I could get'turned on' by a collection of posters," he said.

"Postcards are really very interesting, said Hope people like them because they want to see what their town or city looked like back as far as 1800."

A Massachusetts state law requires that anything labeled as antique must be at least 100 years old. For this reason the Turners describe many of their items as "collectables."

"People buy anything as a collectable because it will soon be an antique,"Hope said.

Near the entrance of the small underground shop hangs a silhouette cloth picture of President Harrison. The item is unique explained Hope because it was the first time any United States president had a full length picutre done. Previous to that only busts or profiles were seen, she said.

"You never know what you're going to find," Malcolm said. "You find things you don't expect all the time."

"This thing is like a fever, said Hope, the more you do it the more you just keep going."

Trial on for narcs charged in false raid

By DENNIS MONTGOMERY
Associated Press Writer

ALTON, Ill. (AP) — Eleven narcotics agents go on trial Wednesday in connection with mistaken drug raids on six homes that allegedly left their residents terror-stricken.

Six federal officers and five local policemen were charged in indictments returned by a federal grand jury last August. They were accused of planning and carrying out raids in the East St. Louis area last April violating the civil rights of 11 persons.

No drugs were found in any of the raids and all 11 law enforcement officers have been suspended.

The raids first came to light April 24 when Herbert Giglotto of Collinsville, Ill. told his story.

"At about 9:30 last night we heard this crash," he said. "We hear this screaming. I take about three steps out of bed and I see these hippies with guns... "I told my wife, 'My God, we're dead."

Giglotto said a dozen agents invaded his apartment looking for drugs. They left after discovering they had the wrong address but not before Giglotto, according to the indictment, was handcuffed and thrown on a bed by an agent who held a pistol to his head, demanded information on drug trafficking and threatened to kill him.

Later that night there was a second mistaken raid, at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Donald Askew in Collinsville. The door of the house was broken down and men brandished pistols and shotguns, the Askews said, before discovering they had the wrong house.

If you're gonna streak, say police - Don't stop!

Streaking has hit campuses nationwide and the Associated Press, a news service to which The Collegian subscribes, summarized the craze in a story printed over nationwide teletypes to newspapers yesterday afternoon. A report in Tuesday's Collegian quoting UMass public safety director David Johnston was part of that report. Here it is:

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

What do you say to a naked streaker? Not much-as long as he keeps going.

"It's when they stop somewhere that we take action," said David L. Johnston, University of Massachusetts public safety director.

Not all school authorities are as lenient as Johnston, but campus police generally have not interfered with the groups of students, racing across campus in the nude, trying to keep up with the latest college fad.

There have been scattered arrests, generally when the streaking spilled onto city streets and interfered with non-students.

"If streaking is the most serious problem ahead, we're going to have a pretty uneventful spring," said Paul Ginsberg, the dean of students at the University of Wisconsin.

Johnston said streaking is better than "throwing bombs and fighting police. I see this as indicative of a change back to normalcy, a return to traditional student behavior."

Two Missouri streakers managed to speed through a police station and excape arrest. "They caught us by surprise," said one policeman who watched dumbfounded as the two men, wearing nothing but boots, raced through a St. Louis stationhouse early Tuesday.

About 90 students, led by a coed, got into the act at West Chester State College in Pennsylvania late Monday night, streaking from dorm to dorm and winding up at the campus recreation area, where a brass band from the school of music played "Hey Look Me Over."

One young man was charged with indecent exposure and posted $53 bond for his release; the other was accused of disorderly conduct and resisting arrest and had to post $105 bond.

Hurok dies

NEW YORK (AP) - Impresario sol Hurok, who brought Russia's greatest performers to the most prestigious American concert halls, died Thursday of a heart attack. He was 85.

His office said he had had lunch with famed guitarist Andres Segovia and then visited David Rockefeller, president of the Chase Manhattan Bank. He fell ill during the meeting.

Hurok was pronounced dead on arrival at Beekman Downtown Hospital, near the bank's offices in the Wall Street area.

Israel, Britain rebuilding governments

Meir wins support

TEL AVIV (AP) - Premier Golda Meir won a massive vote of support from her Labor party yesterday to head a new government for peace talks with the Arabs.

But the voting failed to end a Cabinet crisis that could prompt Mrs. Meir to resign.

More than 500 members of the party's 615-member Central Committee voted for "the immediate formation of a government able to take action and decisions, headed by Golda Meir."

Only four Laborites abstained and none voted against the resolution. But Defense Minister Moshe Dayan, who refuses to stay in office, wants the opposition included in any new government for strength.

Dayan and 44 of his party associates voted to support Mrs. Meir but refused to vote for the proposed minority government. Their dissent threatened to keep the political crisis simmering.

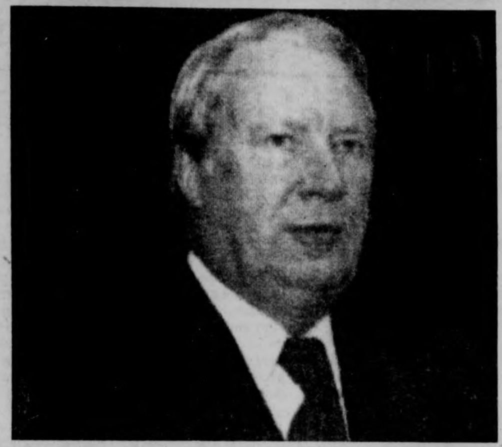
"I regard Golda Meir as the most suitable prime minister," Dayan declared, throwing his weight behind the 75-year-old leader, but he warned: "I do not think a minority Cabinet is a good thing...I am not in favor of this government." The fragile minority Cabinet Meir has proposed would be charged with handling, among other things, negotiations with the Arabs through Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger. It would represent only 58 of the 120 seats in parliament.

She opposes the idea of a "national unity" government embracing the opposition. She contends it would be paralyzed in peace bargaining with the Arabs or in handling Israel's mounting problems following the October Middle East war.

The ailing Mrs. Meir, who stayed at home resting from shingles and fatigue, declined to attend the crucial party session that lasted six hours. She had until Wednesday midnight to present a new government.

In any case, Mrs. Meir will stay on as premier of a caretaker Cabinet until a new government emerges from the political confusion since Israel's election last Dec. 31.

Yitzhak Rabin, former ambassador to Washington and a former chief of staff, was named to replace Dayan as defense minister. He has taken part in Israel's negotiations with Kissinger.



Wilson names cabinet

LONDON (AP) Prime Minister Harold Wilson chose a new cabinet with a left-wing look Tuesday and ordered swift action to tackle Britain's gravest economic crisis since World War II.

He aimed first at settling the strike of the nation's 280,000 coal miners so that the country can get back to full-time work. Other key goals in his program were arrangements to set up billions of dollars worth of foreign credit to keep Britain solvent and steps toward renegotiating terms of Britain's membership in the European Common Market.

Brokers, bankers and businessmen appeared relieved that a phase of uncertainty and instability now seemed to be ending. Shares on the London stock market surged forward at the prospect of an end to the three-day workweek and reopening of the coal mines. The pound jumped up an initial four cents to $2.3220, a show of reviving international confidence.

Wilson's 15 cabinet ministers, with two women among them, seemed on the surface to be a careful balance of the Labor party's left, center and rightist factions. But with crucial posts going to radical-minded Socialists, the over-all bias appeared distinctly leftist. Among those considered more radical were Michael Foot, Anthony Wedgewood Benn, Barbara Castle, Peter Shore and to a lesser extent Denis Healey.

The middle-of-the-road Liberal party, which holds the balance of power between the much larger Labor and Conservative parties, said in a statement that "claims that this would be a governemnt of national unity are wholly begus."

Wilson will need the Liberals to get major legislation passed in the House of Commons, where he holds only 301 of the 635 seats. That is more than any other party, but not enough for an outright majority. But his minority government would not necessarily fall on every defeat, unless the issue were made a question of confidence.

Wilson handed the major ministerial assignments to three men:

-Foot, 61, employment minister, was under orders to settle the coal miners' strike quickly.

-Healey, 56, as chancellor of the exchequer, will work in harness with Lever. His orders are to prepare a budget likely to recall the austerity of World War II days.

-James Callaghan, 61, as foreign secretary has the task of beginning the process of renegotiating terms of Britain's membership in the Common Market.

Witness called 'liar' at Wounded Knee trial

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — A loudly whispered "liar" from the defense table yesterday challenged the truthfulness of a Roman Catholic priest testifying about events surrounding last year's 71-day occupation of Wounded Knee, S.D.

It also propted a stern rebuke from U.S. District Judge Fred J. Nichol to defendants Russell Means and Dennis Banks.

"I think it's entirely uncalled for on the part of both defendants," said Nichol of the whispered exclamation.

Asst. U.S. Atty. R. D. Hurd objected to Means' whispered remark, but defense attorney William Kunstler, conducting cross examination of the Rev. Paul Manhart said: "I didn't hear it."

But, the judge retorted: "I heard it!"

Father Manhart, pastor of Sacred Heart Catholic Church which was taken over by militants on Feb. 27, 1973, was on the witness stand for a third day.

Kunstler offered in evidence a statement read by Father Manhart at a teepee meeting March 8 when several Indian and government officials were negotiating.

The statement, purporting to be the sentiment of most Wounded Knee residents, called for an end to roadblocks manned by government forces with freedom for all at the besieged village to come and go at will.

Was all of February's gas delivered?

By LOUISE COOK
Associated Press Writer

State energy officials say they really can't tell whether the oil companies are delivering all of the gasoline they're supposed to under emergency fuel allocations ordered late last month.

"We have no precise way of knowing," said James W. Cook, the energy coordinator of Illinois, which was supposed to get an extra 31.4 million gallons of gasoline added to its regular February allocation of 313.6 million gallons.

Pennsylvania energy chief William Wilcox said he didn't even know how much the regular February allocation would be until Feb. 20. "We're flying blind," he said, adding that he has no idea whether all of his 25.2-million-gallon emergency allocation has been delivered.

The Federal Energy Office, in two separate orders, directed the oil companies to release extra gasoline from inventories to 26 states and the District of Columbia. The emergency allocations totalled more than 315 million gallons and boosted the original allocations by 10 per cent.

State officials contacted in an Associated Press survey said yesterday that they generally had to depend on reports from the oil companies and service stations in trying to determine whether the fuel actually arrived. They said service station lines seem to be shorter, indicating that there probably is more gasoline available. How much more, they don't know.

Cook said that some of the extra gasoline involved already was in the state, stored in tanks, barges and filling stations. The rest of the fuel had to be rought from other areas.

Did the gasoline get to the public? "We don't have a formalized checking arrangement," said Cook. "One of the most significant checks is the number of calls we get for emergency help in getting the product."

The energy officer said calls dropped off "drastically" after Feb. 22, when the second emergency allocation was announced. He also said that service station lines seemed shorter.

Federal energy chief William E. Simon said Monday that the allocations had succeeded in cutting down the wait for gasoline. "We've seen the alleviation of the lines in all the hard-hit areas," he said, although he could not promise that the lines wouldn't return once the allocations are exhausted.

Connecticut officials agreed that the lines are shorter and said, therefore, that the extra gasoline must be arriving. But the state Energy Emergency Agency says it hasn't received any reports from the oil companies or their distributors and can't really tell how much fuel has been delivered.

The best way of checking, said agency officials, would be gasoline tax records, but those records aren't compiled until a month after collections.

Nevada officials said that only 45,000 of the extra 1.9 million gallons allocated to the state had been delivered by Monday.

The rest of the fuel "is in the process of arriving and will come through normal channels during the first two weeks of this month," said Kelly Jackson of the state Public Service Commission. Jackson said the oil companies "have told us by telegram that they recognize their obligation" to provide the gasoline.

John C. Tolson III, the chairman of the North Carolina Energy Panel, said he asked the oil companies to advise his office how much fuel was delivered and to whom. Thus far, he said, he's received no reports and doesn't know how much of the allocation has arrived.

George Rodericks, who is heading the gas allocation program for the District of Columbia, said he received telegrams from the major oil suppliers telling him the fuel had been delivered. He said the extra gasoline enabled 40 stations in the district to open for two hours a night last week.

Vic Rasheed, the head of the Greater Washington-Maryland Service Station Association, said the District of Columbia "seems to be doing well with its share, much better than some of the suburbs."

Was all the gas delivered? "Who can tell," Rasheed replied.

Missouri officials had another problem. The Fuel Allocation Board said it was so busy trying to fill requests for gasoline and other petroleum products that it didn't have time to keep track of the extra 12.4 million gallons in the emergency allocations.

The energy crisis

Optimism continues towards oil embargo

WASHINGTON (AP) — Optimism that the Arabs will completely lift their oil embargo against the United States continued here yesterday as Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger briefed President Nixon on his Middle East trip.

Kissinger spent 45 minutes with Nixon at the White House. Afterward, Gerald L. Warren, the deputy press secretary turned aside all question with the comment, "they said any assumption other than they are hoping for a removal when the Arab oil ministers meet Sunday in Libya "would be absurd."

Kissinger also had lunch with Sen. J. W. Fulbright, D-Ark., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. Kissinger testified on Wednesday at a closed session of the House Foreign Affairs Committee.

Experts says an early end to the Arab oil embargo might ease the threat of U.S. gasoline rationing but would not necessarily bring a quick return to business as usual in this country.

It probably would take at least a month for tankers carrying Arab oil to begin reaching the United States once the embargo is lifted, and it could be several weeks more before the rate of imports increased to pre-embargo levels.

Beyond those built-in delays, however, a big question is whether the Arabs would remove all limits from their preduction and imports, allowing the United States to go back to meeting all demand.

Gas this Sunday on Mass. Turnpike

BOSTON (AP) — The 11 service stations on the Massachusetts Turnpike will be selling gasoline again this Sunday, continuing the practice initiated last weekend, Turnpike Authority Chairman John T. Driscoll announced today.

"Things went smoothly Sunday and patrons were pleased with the Sunday sales system," he said, adding the practice would continue as long as gasoline allocations for the turnpike hold out.

"An application has been filed with the state energy office for additional allocations for the turnpike stations," Driscoll said.

The stations began selling gasoline on Sundays to all cars regardless of license plate numbers at the request of Gov. Francis W. Sargent.

Delays will follow embargo end

WASHINGTON (AP) — An early end to the Arab oil embargo, new hoped for by U.S. sources, might ease the threat of gasoline rationing but would not necessarily bring a quick return to business as usual.

It probably would take at least a month for tankers carrying Arab oil to begin reaching the United States once the embargo is lifted, and it could be several weeks more before the rate of imports increased to pre-embargo levels.

Beyond those built-in delays, however, remained two big questions:

-How seen would the embargo actually end?

-And how much oil would the Arabs permit to be preduced and exported to the United States?

If the embargo continued much longer, its ending could be too late to increase U.S. supplies, particularly of gasoline, in time for spring and summer vacation seasons.

Just as big a question is whether the Arabs would remove all limits from their production and imports, allowing the United States to go back to meeting all demand. They may not.

Instead, the Arab nations could limit their production and refuse to provide ever-increasing exports of oil to meet a rising U.S. demand; in that case, the United States would have to continue its fuel-saving measures or face a growing oil shortage.

Authoritative U.S. sources, hoping that a meeting of Arab oil ministers scheduled for next Sunday would bring an end to the embargo, nevertheless seemed to think it would not lead to unrestrained production.

Instead, the expectation appeared to lean toward a return to pre-embargo production levels, requiring continued U.S. conservation efforts.

A few statistics show the situation:

-Total U.S. petroleum imports peaked last November at about 7.1 million barrels per day, then plunged downward as the Arab embargo took effect.

-In recent weeks, total petroleum imports have averaged around 4.9 million barrels daily, about 2.2 million barrels below the November peak.

-An end to the embargo and restoration of pre-embargo imports could raise imports back to the 7.1-million-barrel rate; but U.S. petroleum demand presumably would have continued to grow in the meantime.

-The National Peroleum Council estimates that increased demand would require imports averaging some 7.5 million barrels daily by the second quarter of this year.

-If the embargo continued, the NPC said, the nation would have to increase its conservation efforts to save that additional 400,000 barrels per day.

Chinese Club plans March cultural fair

By JANE OATES

"Chinese Martial Arts are a physical expression of Sino Culture", said Philip Luk, vice-president of the campus Chinese Club. An obvious lover of these arts, Philip went on to say that through the dances, or katas, one can grasp the teachings of the ancient Tao and Budhist Priests. During the informal get-together the club's co vice-president Victor Lo added his quiet but firm enthusiasm.

With the successful China Night in their favor, the Chinese-club is going on with bigger and better plans for the future. Presently they and the Five College Asian Student Association are making plans for an international culture fair to be held during the week of March 16th. The program, still in the planning stage, will offer demonstrations on Japanese flower gardens and arrangements, Japanese paper folding, martial arts from all over the world, calligraphy, arts, crafts, films and sports for all age groups.

A non-profit organization, the Chinese Club invites anyone interested to join. Club meetings can be cultural experiences also. Mr. Luk said that those interested in calligraphy and Chinese Art forms may find members who are willing to share their knowledge and talent. Anyone interested may contact either Mr's Luk or Lo.

Leverett—all roads now 'scenic'

By MARK KELLEHER

Hoping to maintain the rural quality of their town, delegates to the Leverett Town Meeting recently passed a law designating all roads within the town as scenic roads.

The scenic road category falls under Chapter 40, Section 15c of the General Laws of Mass. and is as follows:

"After a road has been designated as a scenic road, any repair, maintenance, reconstruction, or paving work shall not involve or include the cutting or removal of trees, or the tearing down or destruction of stone walls, or portions thereof, except with the prior written consent of the planning board after a public hearing duly advertised in a newspaper of general circulation in the area, as to time, date, place and purpose, the last publication to occur at least seven days prior to such hearing.

"Designation of a road as a scenic road shall not affect the eligibility of a city or town to receive construction or reconstruction aid for such road pursuant to the provisions of Chapter 90".

Rt. 63 was not included in the new law.

Contacted at the Amherst Town Hall, town planner Jim Cope said that "a list of names has been submitted to the Board of Selectmen, but as of yet no action has been taken." Asked as to whether action was possible in the near future, Mr. Cope replied that he didn't know.

The scenic road proposals will primarily affect the rural sections of Amherst.

Two Vermont towns urge impeachment

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Two town meetings in Vermont passed resolutions Monday night urging the Congress to impeach President Nixon.

In one town, Thetford, television cameras from the three major networks rolled as town meeting members voted 160 to 130 to ask the House of Representatives to impeach the President "so that he can answer charges in trial before the U.S. Senate."

A few miles south in the Connecticut River Valley, town meeting members in Springfield voted 130 to 108 urging the House to impeach the President so he can answer charges in a Senate trial.

The resolution stated that "if he be found not guilty, the integrity of the government will have been restored. If he be found guilty, he shall be removed from office, as so stated in the Constitution."

That's all

By BARBARA VOORHEES

Goddam it every time I try to turn around there it is again that finger someone pointing that big fat finger at someone else who is a sexist or racist overt mind you and that big fat finger gets pointed so many times over and over and the words get said so many times over and over that it gets to be a goddamn trite joke this big serious business turns into something to laugh about ha ha ha and the joke is on you oh I'm so tired of it.

And maybe we each one of us ought to sit down and think about where we each one of us is coming from before we can figure out where we are at and where we together can and are going to go.

Cause I'm real sorry everybody but I couldn't come up here to UMass and say la da da da da da here I am liberated and snap my fingers and stop being a racist and a sexist after learning how to be a racist and a sexist all my life.

My grandparents and parents were and they never evenknew it and they taught me to be like them not because they were evil but because they wanted to fit in and be normal and they wanted me to fit in and be normal cause life is a lot more pleasant and easy that way.

Yeah I learned to be upset when the coloreds moved in next door and I learned that I was gonna have to make myself pretty and dumb to get a nice big smart guy to take care of me while I had babies.

Yeah I learned to be unfair to other people because of the color of their skin and to be unfair to myself because of my sex and I know right now down in the pit of my stomach and I can feel it in my guts that I want to unlearn everything and wipe that slate clean and start out fresh and pure and white...

And you see that I can't do it.

Already when I'm thinking fresh and pure and clean and all sorts of fresh pure clean things I come out and call that white-a Freudian slip and I can sense that big fat finger geting ready to point itself my was and I can sense that hand getting ready to slap me down and I can hear those words I've heard them over and over and over you are a racist and I can just laugh ha ha in a tired way oh I'm so tired of it and I don't want to try anymore.

And when I go to a women's center I don't feel supported or happy that I am a woman but I feel uncomfortable maybe it's the way I look or talk or how I'm not at all up on every stitch of women's rights activities or am I a sexist because it makes me feel good and liked when a man opens a door for me or buys me a drink or because I really love men but I don't want to look or talk or act or be like a man because I love being a woman. I don't know what it is but I feel that finger and that hand and those words coming my way and I don't even want to laugh anymore but I want to scream that I am a person.

That's all.

Knives better than guns

To The Editor:

Gerry Cataldo has declared (4 March) that it's "Gun Control Time" again. I disagree; it's long past time. My commendations go to Mr. Cataldo for his concise argument and I would strongly urge him to send it to a larger paper, Times, for wider distribution. I, too, feel that the NRA has misplaced its priorities and energies by trying to keep handguns legal. Handguns are not "sporting" rifles; there is a basic difference.

I might add that, having been trained as a killer in the service of Uncle Sugar, I find shooting at other human beings to be an eminently unsatisfactory pastime. And, having been on the receiving end as well, I know it is definitely outre to be shot at. My peace of mind and that of others with a life-wish would definitely be enhanced by the knowledge that hand guns are restricted. True, I would not be absolutely safe from them, but the betting odds would be greatly improved. I like to improve my survival odds whenever possible. If we must carry "self-defense" weapons, why not a knife? A knife at least has multiple peace-time uses which a gun does not: cutting string, peeling oranges, sharpening pencils and its contribution to noise pollution is negligible.

In short, Gerry, right on. Keep on trucking; there are still a few sane people in this world you might influence.

We are not dead

To The Editor:

At the risk of giving undue legitimacy to the article on Program Council in Friday's "Below the Salt", I would like to correct a glaring inaccuracy -- We are not dead! As Chairperson of Program Council, I speak with assurance and would like to use this occassion to inform the campus community of some of our upcoming events.

Throughout the coming semester a variety of local artists will be exhibiting their works in the Art Gallery and Music Room of the Campus Center-Student Union; the movie committee has completed its schedule of major motion pictures to be shown on Thursdays and Sundays for the remainder of the year; the recreation schedule of bridge, chess, bowling, etc. is continuing with UMass being represented in three national championships; social committee is finalizing plans for a major concert on April 5 and, in co-sponsorship with Concert Committee, will be presenting the annual Spring Concert in the Stadium on May 12. Other events are also in the planning stage including a talk and workshop featuring Gary Trudeau of "Doonesbury" fame, a children's art festival and "Springfest" in cooperation with CC Food Services among other things.

I find it sad that individuals deliberately disrupt and misrepresent and, even sadder, that these malcontents are given a forum for their mindless chattering. I call upon Mr. Gomes and other staff members of the Collegian to demonstrate some professionalism in their investigative reporting, advocacy journalism or whatever name is usually given to this type of information.

I invite anyone interested in working on Program Council this year or next to contact me through RSO activities office in the Student Union or the Board of Governors office CC 817. The quality of programming in this campus will continue to be good as long as interest and involvement continue.

Robert S. McDonnell, Chairperson

Jim Lindsey: for yourself?

To The Editor:

James Lindsey's letter attacking my article in Below the Salt seems to have the same ratio of fact vs. fiction he accused my article of having (98 per cent - 2 per cent). He states that no Program Council reorganization will take place without first going through proper channels and that no change has taken place yet. Well, it has!! The Program Council Constitution provides that each Committee shall elect it's own Chairperson and that the Chairperson has signatory power (can sign the checks). However, at the Board meeting the day before his letter, Mr. Lindsey announced that he had removed the Chairperson of the Special Events Committee and had even taken over the signatory power himself. Such action can take place only after a 2-3 vote of the Program Council and even then, Mr. Lindsey cannot assume the duties of the Chairperson. How do you explain that, Mr. Lindsey?

As for the legislation that reduced Graduate RSO-Student Activity payments to $3.26 and increased Undergraduate payments to over $51.00, those members of the Undergraduate Senate I've talked to seem to feel that YOU, Mr. Lindsey, did most of the work organising that proposal. However, Mr. Lindsey in his letter of rebuttal said that he merely approved someone else's idea. Mr. Lindsey was also quick to state that "the officers of the BOG are not involved in a graduate Student conspiracy". It's nice to have such information volunteered, but "conspiracy" is a word I was carefull not to use in the article. I merely mentioned the effects of last year's re-organization and of this year's proposed one. I merely stated that we undergraduates pay the lions share this year, and that your proposal will have us Undergraduates pay at least $52.00 while the Graduates pay 0 cents. Your rebuttal is an example of the inequities of such a system. This year, Graduate Students have not contributed one cent towards Below The Salt, or the Collegian. We Undergraduates still allowed you to publish a rather scathing rebuttal. Don't you think it only fair that you pay at least a token amount, Mr. Lindsey?

I noticed that Mr. Lindsey was careful to avoid this issue of Graduate Student non-payment under the proposal, which is what the article was all about. Also, he did not deny this fact, or his share of the authorship for this years proposal, on HIS conflict of interest in being paid by the Board of Governors, the Graduate Senate, and the University all at once, or that under his proposal Graduate Students will pay nothing towards RSO-Student Activities and yet have a profound effect on the administration of the funds through their membership on the BOG.

I will let Larry St. Cyr, President of the Southwest Assembly answer to Mr. Lindsey's slur on Southwest. In closing, I'll quote from Mr. Lindsey's letter. "...we need help, advice, and support in room 817 of the Campus Center." Yes, I think you need all that and more.

Lindsey: answer my questions

To The Editor:

In response to Chairperson of the Board of Governors James Lindsey's letter Monday, I feel that he ignored one of the major facts in Noel Conley's article.

Is it or is it not true that you are being paid from the Campus Center for being Chairperson of the Board, from the Graduate Senate for being Treasurer of the Graduate Senate, and from the School of Business Administration for doing research, Chairperson Lindsey? Since the answer is is the affirmative and the Board of Governors granted you a waiver from their previously steadfast rule that anyone paid as a Board member could not receive pay elsewhere, who do you really represent? Could it be possible that you don't like Noel Conley, the Southwest representative, because he is one of the few who opposed your waiver? Or is it because he doesn't agree with you everything?

I would like a response to these questions in writing to the Collegian.

Larry St. Cyr, Jr.
President, Southwest Assembly

Nixon a person? I doubt it

To The Editor:

Nixon is a person? I doubt it.

Apparently Joe Formica thinks that Nixon should be forgiven for his numerous sins because he is, after all, a human being. Well, Joe, I have news for you. The Americans who died in Vietnam were human beings. The men who got their arms, legs and balls shot off are human beings. The Vietnamese who were bombed, shot, arrested and tortured were and are human beings. The Americans at home who are freezing, unemployed, manipulated and spied upon and deceived are human beings.

Nixon is indeed being "attacked by millions." Nixon is harvesting the crop that he planted. The millions that he has victimized have had it.

I'm sure Nixon does suffer when he reads the paper. I hope so. He deserves to suffer.

And you're right, Joe, I wouldn't hang Nixon. Hanging is too good for him. Nixon should "hang there, twisting, slowly, slowly in the wind."

We should have a contest to pick a fitting punishment for Richard Nixon. I would suggest that we take away everything he has earned from bribery, tax dodges and evasions; that is to say, everything he has. Then give him a job as boring and demeaning as the jobs most americans have. It should pay, say, $11,000 per year. Then let him try to support a family on that. Watch him as the IRS devours his paycheck. As the bank repossesses his car. Sweet thought, isn't it?

But if anyone has a better one, please send to the Collegian.

And as for you, Joe, I suggest that you work on a good excuse for Hilter before you tackle the big creeps like Nixon.

Placement Office woes

The goal of the Career Planning and Placement Service (now part of Student Development and Career Planning) is not to get you a job but to teach you how to get one. They clearly do not provide most Umies with jobs and it is questionable how many they instruct on the finer points of seeking employment.

Jobs are difficult to come by this year especially if you're a liberal arts major. According to a recent survey only 27 per cent of the companies interviewed were looking for liberal arts people. Accountants and engineers were in high demand, however. The adverse employment situation is compounded by a trend where more college graduates are produced than can be absorbed by the labor market.

The Placement Office, located in Berkshire House, brings interviewers to campus. Last year 246 different organizations conducted over four thousand interviews on this campus. Rooms have been provided in the Student Union and Whitmore for these meetings. Some firms return yearly.

Other organizations are sought out by the Placement Office. If more people sign up for appointments than can be handled the interviewer will be given the resumes of other interested students if they with them.

There are some major problems in the recruitment schemes, however. First, it seems that the interviews conducted on campus are oriented more towards the needs of the companies than to the goals of the students. This year for instance a large percentage of those willing to speak to liberal arts majors are life insurance companies, banks and retail stores. They want people willing to train in insurance underwriting, management, and retailing. It seems to me that if someone has spent four years studying history, government and sociology and enjoyed it insurance unnerwriting is not a first job choice. The problem with on campus recruitment is not the number but quality of the organizations. The Placment Office should be more selective in what companies it invites. They should look for organizations who will have needs related more closely to student's goals. To do this it is necessary to understand what students want which brings us to the second major problem in the office.

The Placement Office has a great deal of information to pass out, but because of a lack of publicity most people will not hear about it. Last year only 46 per cent of the graduating class left a resume with the office. This is a minimal amount of participation. A member of the staff said this was because students are apathetic but this explanation is difficult to accept. Students may be apathetic about a lot of things but very few people are apathetic about themselves. The problem is communication. The Placement Office can offer advice on how to write a resume, where to look for a job, what kind of job to look for and when to start looking. They will also keep your resume, transcript and recommendations on file for a number of years.

To inform people of these services they should begin a massive publicity campaign. Area governments often offer colloquia; these one credit courses would be an excellent opportunity to advise students. Next, more information should be printed in the Collegian; perhaps a list of the organizations will appear on campus in the future. Third, more information should be distributed directly to the dorms. At present some houses post the Career Placement News; every dorm should have a member of the government who is responsible for this. The degree of coordination between faculty members who counsel students on careers and the Placement Office should be increased.

Perhaps the most important service the Placement Office could offer would be to inform students in their first and second years what the job prospects are in their field. Then help them find a job that coincides with their interests when they are seniors.

H.J. Moore: streaker!

Last week, whilst I was pondering over a multivolume documentary on the Potential of Petrified Yak as an Artificial Stimulant for Use in Frontal Lobotomies, my serious thoughts on these protentious subjects, manifestly crucial in our Freudian world, were grossly interrupted by certain screams and shouts eminating from outdoors. Turning from my Greenough study, I thought I recognized the sound of the mating call of the South American Armidillo but upon mulling it over, I concluded it had to be the call of the Passed Out Umie.

"VAN ETER SIX, CHADBOURNE ONE, AND GREENOUGH SUCKS!!!!! was belched hideously a number of times.

"What! Who!" was all I could intelligently muster until I looked out the window and noticed several of the University's finest scampering up and down the lawn, clad no less in "woolens woven from the fine threads of their Brain cells," eg. total nudity. People were oozing out of Van Meter's windows cheering them on and notching up another score in the enduring battle with the neighboring dorm. In this life-death struggle for supremacy between these bastions of lechery, I have it from a reliable source, the losing dorm would be orched at the end of the month, and salt plowed into the earth where it had previously stood. Well priding myself as an objective journalist, I put on my Jimmy Olsen Visor and my Walter Cronkite White Gloves and went outside to interview one of the "Streakers," to use the vernacular as he-she struck by. To my disappointment there were no females flying about but I did manage to flag down one sort, dressed in nothing but a Sherlock Holmes Cap, Pipe and Kamikaze hiking boots.

Z.N.: "Excuse me, sir!! excuse me, could you stop for a second and answer a few questions that I have?"

Streaker: "Well, Ok! for a second. The pigs are coming and it is a bit nippy out!"

Z.N.: Ok, Alright. What's your name and major?"

Streaker: "My name is Harvard J. Moone, that's moon with an E, see! (As he bent over backwards to demonstrate) and I'm a HumDev major from Chicopee."

Z.N.:"I'm sure you are. Tell me, as an unenlightened type, why are you "streaking?"

Moone: "I'm glad you asked me that question. .. There are in fact a number of motivating factors for my joining the "Movement?"

Moone: "Why Streaking of course (he said reverently). One reason is that I'm catching some rays. You see I firmly believe in an even suntan or an even moontan as the case might be. I don't want those ugly pale blotches on My ass. Another reason is that its excellent exercise. Two streaks every night around the campus puts me into shape so I can fight off the crowds at the check cashing lines in the Student Union. You know streaking is part of the President's National Sports Program. Yessir, I read in the Collegian where he streaked over to Judge Sirica's house and back, in an effort to lay out the bare facts of Watergate once and for all.

Z.N.: "I didn't know that!"

Moone: "And that's not all! I'm getting fifteen credits from the School of Ed for this entitled: Learning Experience: Methods in Organic Ludity, Lex 5553. Not only that but I'm planning to teach a course for Global Survival entitled "Get Your Ass in Gear!," and I'm getting what is known as "in the field experience."

Z.N.: "No doubt. But tell me really, aren't you afraid of getting arrested. It's against the law you know."

Moone: "Yes, imprisonment has crossed my mind. But you see, a man must search his soul and plumb the depths of this conscience and arrive at his own personal course of action. After much thought, I've decided that total student apathy and a reversion into the degenerate days of the Pre-Peace Generation were too dear to me to keep still anymore. You see, for the past several years, college students have been arrested for anti-war activities, such as sitting in at Westover. Now they can be arrested protesting for the right to "Total Personal Expression." We've got to get our heads together and forget about politics and life and concentrate on streaking, eating goldfish and crowding into telephone booths.

Z.N.: "And of course if I'm arrested, I will become a symbol, a martyr of civil disobedience. The Student Senate can then vote me funds for my defense. I can just see the bumperstickers reading: SPRING MOONE, HE GAVE THE SKIN OFF HIS ASS, WILL YOU GIVE YOURS? People will be wearing Harvey J. Moone Bracelets on their wrists until they release me. I can see it now!"

Z.N.: "You over estimate the commitment of your fellow exhibitionists, I think."

Moone: "You know you might be right. There are too many assholes streaking. Well! Gotta Run!"

OH, THE PAIN OF IT ALL!!!

MDC defined

The following article was written by Micheal Shor, Business Manager of the COLLEGIAN.

By MIKE SHOR

After much thought and consideration I've decided to enter the arena and dabble in the fine art of college journalism. This decision was initiated by the wide and numerous array of recent complaints lodged against both the Collegian, and its board of editors. As a member of this esteemed group, I can only read a maximum amount of stacked criticism before I ask myself, and the readership, Why?

Let me first note a number of brief facts concerning our paper, which may set straight mistruths, or serve as a sense of enlightenment to what may represent a misinformed public. The Collegian, printed daily with a press run of 18,000 copies, is manufactured entirely by the work of UMass students, and the bulk of the workload is done on a voluntary basis with little or no financial renumeration, only a sense of accomplishment being the reward.

The Collegian has a budget for fiscal 1973-74 of $211,000, including a Student Senate appropriation of $85,000 collected from the undergraduate student fees. This incidentally is equivalent to the payment of approximately ½ of the printing costs of the paper. The remaining $126,000 is anticipated or projected advertising revenue - a combination of solicitations by advertising staff members, national ad agency revenue, and local walk-in advertising.

As a college newspaper, the Collegian should have, in my opinion, a few goals to meet the needs of its supporters. First it must present to the best of its ability an unbiased representation of the "news"; second serve as a training ground for budding journalists; and third, act as an organ of public opinion. Apparently there is much doubt permeating this campus about the fulfillment of these goals.

So where does my argument fit into this discussion? Criticism is rampant and should be welcomed by the newspaper, but what are the concrete benefits of this criticism if those who criticize stand idly by without making attempts to improve our product. BECOMING INVOLVED! This should be stressed without hesitation. Decent letters to the editor chastize the works of both our controversal cartoonist and the efforts of a hard working staff who usually remain nameless but represent the backbone of this paper. If mass dissatisfaction exists the solution may be a transfusion. The Collegian cannot survive without a replenished supply of talent and subsequent improvement may be forthcoming.

The writings of Bill Ballou, Larry Carpman, Barbara Voorhees, Matt Tackeff, Reid Fishman, Joyce Kosofsky, Fred Weiss et al have not sprouted out of oblivion. They became involved and hence have their opinions heard and works read. Why don't you do the same!

Letters Policy

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes all letters to the editor. They must be signed, and include the author's address and phone number. Also, all letters must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces per line, and no more than two pages.

Organizations may submit letters, but they must include a name and phone number for reference purposes.

All letters are subject to editing, for either content or space, according to the judgement of the editors. Due to space limitations, there is no guarantee that all letters received will be printed.

MassPIRG fights highways

Last week: MassPIRG reports explained the many ways in which the group serves the students who support it and how students on the regional and local boards direct its activities.

Since its formation, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group has filed a number of environmental and consumer-oriented bills in the state legislature. It has also strongly backed lobbied for the passage of public interest bills filed by others and provided testimony at legislative hearings. When necessary, the PIRG has filed suit and entered into the suits of others as an intervening party. All of these actions are part of its role as an effective citizens' spokesman.

Mass PIRG reports

One example of the type of projects that MassPIRG undertakes was its effort in 1973 to block construction of a new highway in Western New England. Although a court order was issued barring further construction, it has been appealed. The environmental groups involved in the suit are hopeful that the appeal will be decided in their favor, especially since current energy shortages make clear the need for other modes of transportation besides high-speed interstate highways.In 1973, however, the possibility of the transportation authorities cutting a fourlane superhighway through the Berkshires to the west of us was very real.

On February 11, 1973, the Amherst office of MassPIRG, (then WMPIRG), announced the formation of the New England Highway Coalition. This coalition consisted of WMPIRG, Vermont PIRG, and two other environmental groups who were investigating a number of 'town by-passes' and 'local highway improvements' that were taking place in the Western New England area.

That same day the coalition released a report that used information gleaned from Mass., Conn., and Vt. highway department maps and publications. The report concluded that these apparently local and limited improvements were actually only part of a larger undisclosed plan to construct a new limited-access, four-lane divided superhighway from Long Island, N.Y. through the Berkshires in Massachusetts, and up into Burlington Vermont.

The report disclosed that transportation officials had withheld and misrepresented the total scope of the plans at public hearings, thus making it impossible for citizens to decide whether or not they needed or wanted such a superhighway.

By masquerading the gradual construction of the highway as minor improvements to already existing sections of road, the transportation officials would be able to achieve two things:

First, they would only have to evaluate the individual sections of the highway as to their effect on the region before they were allowed to be built. The question of the total effect a superhighway would have on Western New England could be avoided. The Coalition saw this to be a direct violation of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1970, which requires a full study to be made of the effect on the environment of any planned highway. The path of this particular route would wipe out part of the Green Mountain Forest in Vermont, the Coaliation pointed out.

Second, once the individual sections of the highway had been constructed, the transportation authorities would be in a strong position to push for the highway's completion.

The report stated that such a highway would have a very serious effect on the lives of the people and the physical environment in its path and questioned the need for such a major road through rural New England. The coalition felt that construction shouldn't proceed until an extensive study and evaluation of its effect had been completed.

A suit was filed by the Conservation Society of Vermont, Inc. and others against the state and federal highway departments charging the officials with failure to completely survey the effects of what they were planning.

MassPIRG entered the suit in May of 1973 as an intervening party and organized the support of eleven national and regional conservation groups. Its attorneys aided in legal research and student volunteers investigated highway department records and prepared maps for court hearings.

Finally, on July 31, 1973, Appeals Judge James L. Oakes issued an opinion in Vermont federal court blocking the construction on a 20 mile stretch of U.S. Route 7-one of the smaller improvements that was to become part of the superhighway. This decision was seen as an important precedent in regard to the Environmental Policy Act and represented quite a victory to the environmental groups involved in the suit.

The decision by Judge Oakes has since been appealed by the Vermont highway department and will be heard this spring. Students from B.U. Law School are currently working with MassPIRG's attorneys to prepare a legal brief for that hearing.

This is one example of how MassPIRG works to protect the environment and the citizen against powerful (and often evasive) private interests. In this case, it forced the transportation officials to at least adhere to the law before they push through yet another strip of concrete, tar, and metal guard rails. Such efforts represent a good deal of time and labor.

The reading, notetaking, writing, rewriting, and typing that is necessary to compile preliminary research reports that are effective, factual, and concise can be tedious. The time spent on the telephone trying to gather support or get information can often be discouraging. The slow, plodding process of the courts and the legislature can become extremely annoying. Often the total effect of a lot of work seems very slight. But when that investment of time and labor results in real change, the PIRG staff and volunteers feel that it was all worth it.

Credit privacy

BOSTON (AP) - Gov. Francis W. Sargent filed legislation yesterday to bar banks and telephone companies from disclosing customer information to unauthorized persons.

The governor also proposed expansion of the access rights of private citizens to data compiled by consumer credit organizations. Sargent asked for a prohibition against sex discrimination in granting credit.

The governor's message cited an instance where an unidentified Waltham retailer who had granted credit to a single woman in her own name insisted on using her husband's name on the credit card, after [illegible] as married.

The [illegible] man, identified by Sargent only as "Jennifer" protested that she, and not her husband, applied for the credit card and when the retailer preferred the husband's name, she cancelled.

The bill affecting bank and telephone information was aimed at ending what the governor said is a practice of both in "regularly disclosing personal, supposedly confidential records to a variety of governmental and private agencies, businesses and institutions without the permission of tthe consumer."

Warren mini-city

WARREN, Mass. (AP) - Voters here have advised potential developers they object to seeing their town of 3,000 become the site for a small city.

A referendum Monday overwhelmingly rejected proposals to create a "mini-city" here. The vote was 1,069 to 415.

Local officials scheduled the referendum after a Meriden, Conn., firm, Carabetta Enterprises, detailed plans to build a community that was to have included industry, recreational facilities and housing for 30,000 people.

The federal Department of Housing and Urban Development rejected Carabetta's application for $16 million in financial assistance, citing unprecedented local opposition.

Last week a new group, Warren Western Community Inc., announced it had acquired Carabetta's options on 6,800 acres of land and hoped to build a smaller version of the mini-city, housing up to 15,000 people.

Monday's vote was a non-binding referendum designed to guide town officials in considering development plans.

Death penalty

BOSTON (AP) - A bill to restore the death penalty in Massachusetts was passed by the House yesterday and sent to the Senate.

The measure won initial approval on a 156-67 roll call vote and was sent to the Senate on a voice vote after less than two hours of debate.

The bill, similar to death penalty legislation votoed by Gov. Francis W. Sargent late last year, would restore the death penalty for nine specific categories of murder.

Sargent, when he vetoed the bill last year, said he would approve restoration of the death penalty only in connection with the murder of a law enforcement officer.

The governor's decision was made after the legislature's regular session had adjourned. Thus the House and Senate did not have an opportunity to override him.

Under the measure approved by the House Tuesday, the death penalty would be applied to those who commit premeditated murder; murder in the course of a kidnaping; rape or hijacking; murder for hire; an extremely cruel murder; murder in the course of a reaking and entering or armed robbery, and murder by anyone who previously had been convicted of first degree murder.

Park Plaza project tentatively approved

BOSTON (AP) - State Community Affairs Commissioner Lewis S. W. Crampton announced yesterday that he has granted conditional approval to the fourth submission of the proposed $266 million Park Plaza urban renewal plan for downtown Boston.

Crampton said at a news conference that he included some 23 conditions in the approval. Included, he said, are the same environmental provisions outlined in his last Park Plaza decision, which at first was conditional approval and finally a rejection after the developer refused to abide by the conditions.

The controversial project intended in part to clean up Boston's honky tonk district has been rejected three times previously.

Crampton said at the news conference he has no doubt that his decision will lead to court action, but "I have little doubt that the courts will uphold this action."

He said his decision means that the Park Plaza project can move ahead.

The Netherlands Wind Ensemble, which will appear at Bowker Auditorium on Thursday.

Dutch musical group to perform Thursday

The Netherlands Wind Ensemble, making its first tour of the United States, will appear in concert in Bowker Auditorium Thursday at 8 p.m. as the fourth offering of the Fine Arts Council's Chamber Music Series.

Combining superb technique with enthusiasm and youth, (the average age is 27) the group has captured the hearts of European concertgoers. The ensemble is made up of 17 young artists from the leading orchestras in The Netherlands--the Concertgebouw Orchestra of Amsterdam, the Rotterdam Philharmonic Orchestra, the Netherlands Radio Philharmonic Orchestra and the Hague Philharmonic. They all share an enthusiasm for their work, and love of playing together and dedication to the best in music.

Founded in 1960 by the solo bassoonist of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, Thom de Klerk, the ensemble's aim is to restore to popularity the undeservedly neglected wind music of the great masters and lesser-known composers. They are, however, by no means confined to the music of the past. The Netherlands Wind Ensemble includes many modern works in their repertoire, and thirteen contemporary composers have already dedicated new works to the group.

For their only concert in Amherst, the Ensemble will perform Charles Gounod's "Petite Symphonie;" Mozart's Seranade No. 12 in C Minor, K. 388;" "Chason et Danses," Opus 50 (1898) by Vincent D'Indy and Serenade in D Minor, Opus 44, by Antonin Dvorak.

Tickets are now on sale at the Fine Arts Council Box Office, 125 Herter Hall (Tel. 545-0202) and are priced at $2 for UMass-Amherst students; $4 for others.

Vermont rail lines not to be abandoned

BOSTON (AP) - The Canadian Pacific has no intentions of abandoning its railroad lines through Vermont even though they are listed as "potentially excess" in a ederal report, a spokesman said Tuesday.

The Department of Transportation says the Vermont line would be a prime candidate for abandonment if the northeast's railroads are reorganized into a proposed streamlined rail system.

However, Charles P. Watson, a Canadian Pacific spokesman, told an Interstate Commerce Commission hearing that his railroad would not go along with abandoning the track.

The transportation report said the Canadian Pacific's line between St. Johnsbury and Orleans, Vt., was potentially excess because it did not carry enough local traffic.

But Watson said this did not take into consideration the line's importance as an international freight link.

Demonology

"Who Are The Demons and Where Do They Come From?" is the title of a talk and discussion Thursday between 12:15 and 1:15 noon in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union.

The speaker will be Dr. Edward Phinney, Acting Head of the Classics Department, and a Professor of mythology and paganism. Dr. Phinney's fields of interest include demonology, alchemy and astrology.

The discussion will open the spring semester series called "The First Amendement," sponsored by the United Christian Foundation. The title comes from the series' use of First Amendment rights of assembly and free speech, to discuss significant topics.

Great Decisions

The third discussion in the Great Decisions program broadcast tonight over WFCR (88.5 FM) at 8:30 p.m.

Discussing "Cuba and the Panama Canal Zone: Time for a Change in U.S. Policies?" will be panelists: Carol Banglesdorf of the Hampshire College social sciences department; Robert C. Cole, UMass economics; and Harvey F. Kline, UMass political science.

WFCR is broadcasting the entire seven-program series which originates from the Webster House Lounge of the Orchard Hill Residential College at UMass. Discussion participants come from the Five-College Area.

Resident Heads Applications

Information and applications for Head of Residence and Resident Director positions for the 1974-75 academic year are available in the Dean of Students Office, 227 Whitmore. Head of Residence positions are full-time, twelve-month professional appointments. Resident Director positions are part-time service assistantships, September through May, available to students enrolled in the Graduate School. The deadline for applications has been extended to March 15, 1974, and minority and female candidates are urged to apply.

SW film series

In its continuing use of the media to combat racism, the Southwest Center for Racial Understanding has announced its film seires for the remainder of the semester. The films are basically for Southwest students, and will be shown in residence halls. For March, the categories of films will be: "The Sixties and Civil Rights," to Thursday, "Latin American Liberation", March 11-14, and Black History, March 18-21.

The residence halls to show these selections of films will be Thoreau, Patterson, Mackimmie, Kennedy, Washington, John Adams, and J.Q.A. A preview of the films will be shown each Monday afternoon at 1:30 at the Center. For more information regarding times and places of the films, call the Center for Racial Understanding, at 546-0457.

Paneurythmy

A colloquium sponsored by the Southwest Colloquium Office, John Adams Lobby, called "Is There A New Teaching?" will be held on the 19th floor of that building in the lounge by Ernestina Staleva (Northampton, tel. No. 584-0258). The first meeting will be on Thursday, at 8:30 a.m. Until spring vacation, the meetings will be held in the lobby. After that, the class will meet on the field across from the Southwest Complex.

The main objective is to introduce the PANEURHTHMY EXERCISES, which are related to the teaching of Beinsa Douno, native of Bulgaria who taught there until the end of World War II. These exercises have a great significance for the physical as well as mental well being of modern man.

Together with the explanation of the exercises, E. Staleva will speak on the environment, the woman and motherhood, the idea of man, nature, God, the new humanity. Some lectures of Beinsa Douno on health, breathing, absolute purity and others will be read. Thoughts on the significance of music as well as new spiritual songs will be presented. Those who play instruments or like to sing are especially invited to participate.

CASIAC expands

The College of Arts and Sciences Information and Advising Center (CASIAC) now offers an extension center in Orchard Hill.

Information concerning major, core, graduation and foreign language requirements, including substitution and waivers of these requirements is available. Other areas include: practicum 200 (independent study) courses, teaching certification, Five College interchange courses and other special programs at the University.

A survey is being circulated to consider how this center can be adapted to particular needs of Orchard Hill residents.

Office hours are Mondays 4-6 p.m., Wednesdays 3-6 p.m. and Thursdays 10-12 and 1-4 p.m. in 101 Webster.

Weicker on WMUA

The Honorable Senator Lowell Weicker of Conn. spoke at Amherst College on Jan. 24, 1974, as part of the Copeland Colloquim taking place that week. The speech was again heavily drenched in Watergate as was expected. WMUA (91.1 fm) was there to carry the speech live, and will rebroadcast that speech on Thursday at 9:00 p.m.

Nixon assistant calls House inquiry 'ludicrous'

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) - A presidential spokesman said yesterday that the congressional committee considering impeachment of President Nixon is an affront to the American system of justice.

Dr. John McLaughlin, deputy special assistant to the President, told newsmen the House Judiciary Committee's "behavior of late is a ludicrous affront to our legal system."

"Apparently the...committee believes that if it forages the White House files long enough and ransacks widely enough, and bleats the definition of an impeachable offense so as to include non-criminal acts, it should be able to catch the President within its net and topple him."

McLauglin, a Jesuit Priest who joined the administration in 1971 as a speech writer, said the Judiciary Committee "has not yet determined what is an impeachable offense, so there is no charge against the President. Yet they are collecting evidence on an unidentified charge."

He said the "worst back alley mugger has the right to know what he is being charged with" but "the President is beind denied that right."

McLaughlin told newsmen it is his believe that "there is not a shred of evidence" to suggest that President Nixon was an accomplice to any of the Watergate related crimes.

Under the American system of justice, he said, the man in charge can't be held liable for what is subordinates do unless complicity can be demonstrated.

He called the Judiciary Committee's impeachment proceedings "a political football and not a legal process."

As for a possible watergate backlash against Republican candidates in this fall's elections, McLaughlin said it is "difficult to believe that the average American voter is so insufficiently sophisticated so as to visit the sins of people in Washington" on other politicians.

Twenty women poets will read from their works and partake in workshops during the festival which is sponsored by the Feminist Arts Program of Everywoman's Center.

Participating poets are: Gwendolyn Brooks, Mari Evans, Anne Halley, Erica Jong, Shirley Kaufman, Carolyn Kizer, Audre Lorde, Robin Mrogan, Suni Paz, Marge Piercy, Adrienne Rich, Sonia Sanchez, Susan Sherman, Margaret Walker, Pineapple Whitcomb, Tomia Arai, Fay Chiang, Lucille Clifton, Nerle Okada and Caroyn Rodgers.

The festival is open to the public without charge and free child care will be available during all readings and workshops.

Hood Co. announces delivery changes

BOSTON (AP) — H. P. Hood Inc. has announced a program to convert 400 home delivery routes in Massachusetts, Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine to individually-owned distributorships.

Routes in Rhode Island will be sold to Hillside Farms, Inc. of Cranston. A similar arrangement for the Hartford, Conn., area was set up two years ago with Mohawk Farms, Inc. of Newington, Conn.

A Hood spokesman said salesmen will be offered opportunity to acquire ownership of the routes in Massachusetts and the three northern New England states.

The independent distributors will carry the complete line of the fim's dairy and food products, the spokesman said.

Electric files, more space in rebuilt UMass health center

Power files, computerized scheduling, and more clinic space are changing the outpatient scene at the campus Health Center.

"Student patients are spending less time waiting for physicians, and physicians are seeing more patients each day," according to Director Barry Averill of UMass Health Services.

When the $1.2 million building addition is completed this spring, the Health Center will have three outpatient clinics, each with a tele-processing computer terminal to schedule appointments. Completed so far in the addition is the justopened new entrance and reception area which contains a computer terminal, and a power filing system to speed up the acquisition of health records.

Health Center officials look forward to even greater efficiencies when the addition is completed. Then, a clerk will push a button to rotate the power filing shelves and acquire a helath record which will be placed on a conveyor belt and dropped off at the appropriate clinic by a tactile code.

Even now, the power files and computer scheduling are saving time.

About 29,000 health records are available in four ceiling-high power files which each contain a section of the alphabet. Seated clerks simply push buttons to rotate the filing shelves and reach for files, instead of thumbing through tightly packed records in file drawers.

According to Averill, this is New England's first fully automated record system for filing, acquiring, and transporting outpatient health records.

When the computerized tele-processing appointments terminal was introduced three years ago, the UMass Health Center was the first student health clinic in the country to have one, according to the director.

The system was designed by Robert Baron, then a graduate student in the UMass industrial engineering and operations research department. It has, says Averill, reduced the time necessary to process records of incoming outpatients by about 25 percent, and has increased the available physician appointment time by 50 percent.

"Before the tele-processing terminal, physicians saw patients mostly on a walk-in basis which created long patient waiting times, and now they're scheduled to see patients on an appointment basis which saves both staff and student time," he says.

Computer scheduling cuts patient waiting time by producing a list of the next day's appointments so that health records may be taken out of the power files and sent to appropriate clinics before patients arrive for appointments.

Piano recital in Bowker

An array of works for solo piano will be performed by Fernande Kaeser in her recital tonight at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

Two preludes from Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavier" will be the first pieces on the program. These works are part of a series of preludes and fugues which Bach composed. Two compositions by Robert Schumann, who stated "Bach's Well-Tempered Clavier is my grammer," will follow. The pieces, "Fantasiestucke" and "Abegg-Variations" are among the composer's earliest works.

Fernande Kaeser, who has won both the Zurich and Munich International Competitions, is a faculty member of the music department here. The concert is open to the public free of charge.

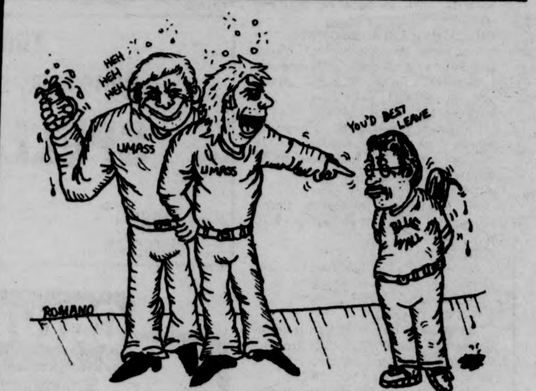
Continuing Ed. to offer special interest courses

Beginning this month, the Division of Continuing Education will offer an Open Semester — a series of courses of special interest, both credit and non-credit, that are run on a schedule that is most appropriate for the course material, instead of on a regular semester basis.

There is no real reason why certain courses must only run from the start of a traditional semester. In fact, certain subjects are better handled on a schedule which suits the needs of the instructor, the material, and, of course, the student. For this reason, Continuing Education is introducing the open semester, in which courses can begin at any suitable time and run as long as is necessary.

Among the credit courses to be offered during the first open semester period are: Abnormal Psychology, Cosmic Origins of Life (Astronomy), and a class in Counseling Theories and Techniques (which is a graduate-level course to be offered in Greenfield).



Oh yah? And I suppose you've got a big stick to chase us out with, don't 'ya? Hah, Hah, Hah!

Nixon's Option

By PAUL PUTES

"Hello Mr. Nixon this is Mr. Bloop, general manager of the Washington Redskins and I am calling to offer you the position of head coach for the coming football season."

"But Mr. BLOOP what happened to George Allen, I thought he was doing an excellent job for the Redskins."

"Oh, he was Mr. Nixon but he plans on running for President in 1976 and wants plenty of time to plan a strategic, George Allen for President, campaign."

"Well tell George if he wants any help on how to run a Presidential campaign, I will be glad to help him call the signals."

"I'm sure you will Mr. Nixon but my main concern is finding a football coach for the Redskins and with your often talked-about football savy and loyalty as a Redskin fan, I can't seem to find a better candidate than yourself."

"Gee Mr BLOOP, I haven't received a compliment like that, for I don't know how long, and it really makes me feel proud to know that somebody out their knows about my football capabilities."

"Oh, don't mention it Mr. Nixon, I'm sure a lot of football fans realize that you can teach any pro football quarterback how to throw the long bomb, which happens to be our major concern with Billy Kilmer.

"I certainly could teach Billy how to throw that all-important long bomb. I've been throwing them for years.

"But, Mr. Bloop there seems to be one problem."

"What's that Mr. Nixon."

"I still have just under two years to serve as President and I don't know if I will have time to coach the Redskins also."

"But Mr. Nixon, President of What?"

"President of the United States, what do you think?"

"But Mr. Nixon didn't you read yesterday's newspaper?"

"Why no, Mr. Bloop, I've been basking in the sun down here in Key Biscayne for the last couple of months."

"Well, to make it perfectly clear Mr. Nixon, you are not President of the United States anymore, you have been convicted of numerous 'high crimes and misdemeanors.' And sentenced with the following options. (1.) Five years as chief salesman for Dilly & Dally tape recording company. (they need expierenced men) (2.) Five years as an undercover agent for the FBI or CIA. (the choice is yours tricky Dick) (3.) Head football coach for any team that will hire you. The Redskins are relying on you to pick your last option so you will be able to help the Redskins have the long bomb threat, something we desperately need to be contenders for the Super Bowl next year. Well, what do you say Mr. Nixon."

"Well, huh...huh...I'll take the job Mr. Bloop, but under one condition."

"What's that coach?"

"If I can pick my own assistants."

"What are you damn wacky, when you were president we fell for that one. What are you trying to do? Come back with the same play. Forget it!"

Finley "close" to sale of hoop Tams

By ROBERT SHAW
Associated Press Writer

MEMPHIS (AP) — The Stax Record Co. has resolved all differences with owner Charles O. Finley for the purchase of the Memphis Tams of the American Basketball Association, an official of the soul music firm said Tuesday.

Larry Show, a Stax vice president, said that while Stax had not concluded the purchase, he expected an announcement to be made before week's end.

Shaw would not say what matters remained to be completed before the sale could be finalized.

He said Finley and Stax, a black-oriented, Memphis-based firm that is the nation's largest soul music recording company, had reached agreement on a purchase price, but would not reveal the figure. Finley reportedly has sought $1 million.

Finley said in a telephone interview Tuesday he and John Burton, a Stax official, were "close" in their negotiations.

Cincy loves the game too

Many a baseball writer, fan and executive of any level is going through a trying stage at this point before the rapidly approaching 1974 baseball season is indeed here and in session. The issue causing such concern is none other than the treatment that the baseball fans of Cincinnatti are receiving from the front office of the Atlanta Braves.

A few weeks ago the owner of the Atlanta Braves spoke out announcing the policy that would disallow Hank Aaron from playing prior to the Braves' home opener in Atlanta so as to give the home town fans the opportunity to view the record tying and-or breaking blasts that will make Aaron the hom run king of all time.

Since then the Commissioner of Baseball has stepped in and, although not officially on the record, told the Braves that they have no right to deprive the baseball fans from the Ohio City of their chances to see the same feat.

Commissioner Kuhn is using the authority of his office to come down hard on the owners who tend to play the game, or rather have it played, for the benefit of their own home ballpark fans.

What would happen if Aaron failed to hit a home run in the opening home stand? Would he then be barred from the next road trip too? This is absurd! Theoretically this could go on all season although realistically there seems no way that it could.

This type of decision regarding who to play is reserved for the team manager. This is what he is paid for. The owner is supposed to make the business ends of the game meet along with the General Manager. He is not to take over the coaching aspects of the game.

It is people such as this that have been ruining the sport culture of America. Let the game be played as the game and not as a "Bring the most fans to my ball park" version of Parker Brothers Monopoly.

So what if the record is broken in Ohio as opposed to Georgia. Is this really to effect attendance in Atlanta? Are the home town fans going to boycott the ballpark because number 44 stroked a couple on the road trip? Be realistic about this whole affair.

The question then arises of whether or not the Commissioner has the right to step in to a team's internal affairs such as is the case here. If the authorities from Atlanta had not spoken so early about the whole matter, they probably could have pulled it off. Such was not to be, however, and for the sake of the fans of baseball it had better not come off that way either.

The manager is the only one who shall decide the starting lineup from day to day and he should, theoretically, not receive any pressures from the front office. His motive would, in most every case, be to play the best eight men he has available in the field, with one of his best pitchers on the mound.

For the sake of this great American game...Mr. Henry Aaron had better be in the line-up come the opening series in April. If he is not—one can bet that the decision came from the front office and not the clubhouse on game day.

Johnson says trade rumor

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Boston Red Sox manager Darrell Johnson denied reports emanating from Chicago that the Red Sox are trying to acquire White Sox third baseman Bill Melten.

A published report in Chicago said the Red Sox had offered second baseman Doug Griffin to the White Sox for Melten.

"It's all news to me," Johnson said Tuesday. "We have Rice Petrocelli, and I consider him my starting third baseman."

The Red Sox also were awaiting the arrival of pitcher Juan Marichal, who is now nearly two weeks late for spring training. He is overdue from his home in Santo Domingo in the Dominican Republic.

Martial arts with Bill Howelle

Origins of Martial Arts

Sensei Stanley Jacobs, Isshin Ryu 3rd dan, demonstrates to his newly promoted shodan UNass anthropology graduate student Bruce Ferrini, "It doesn't hurt," at Hadley Karate Inst.

About 1500 years back, Bodhidharma crossed the Himalayas to teach monks of the Shalolin Temple the way of Buddha. Judging by the availability of information on the arts at UMass, he should have stayed in India.

According to legend this 5th century holyman brought "the Way of Enlightenment" to monks physically unable to endure the rigors of training. "Eighteen hands" exercise was developed to condition the minds and bodies of those, though not allowed weapons, charged with helping the helpless, curing the ill, and acting as benevolents.

Shaolin priests are the recognized source of the Robin Hood-like Kung Fu legends. Kung Fu Wu Su, the disciplined technique of Chinese martial art, was practised 3000 years before, but Bodhidhara is the Moses-like figure in the history of all the "martial arts," as Master Itosu of Okinawa is acknowledged as the key to 20th century karate.

Suffering repression such as John Mitchell would marvel at, Okinawans refined the art secretly through the turn of this century when the teacher of Motobo and Funakoshi broke with tradition and taught karate openly in Japan.

Skaters face tough Vermont in semis

By DAVE EIBEL

Tonight at 8:00 o'clock, 3500 screaming fans will herald the start of the ECAC Division Two semi-final playoff game between the Minutemen of UMass and the Catamounts of Vermont, at Gutterson Field House in Burlington, Vt. But for the Canniffmen to skate to an upset they'll have to come up with a better performance than they did last Saturday night against Boston State.

As Coach Jack Canniff said, "We've got to come up with a better game than we did against Boston State. We can't expect Chickie (goaltender Rheault) to come up with the same type of game. He was magnificent. Without him we probably wouldn't be going to Vermont at all."

Speaking of Rheault, he reinjured his shoulder in Saturday's 7-4 UMass victory, but should be in goal come tonight. More bad news comes in the person of defenseman Mike Ellis who played his first game in three months over the weekend but injured his shoulder. His playing status is still up in the air. In practice Monday he could not shoot and if he can't suit up tonight Canniff will have to go with five defensemen.

In the only meeting between Vermont and Massachussetts earlier this year, the Minutemen played well even though they did lose by a 4-2 count. In that tilt, Canniff used four lines to keep everybody fresh, but tonight he'll use three lines and have four swingmen ready, including Bob Quinlan and Dave Alessandroni who can play either forward or defense.

"Vermont won't come at you as roughly as Boston State did, but they'll be still physical. They combine their physical strength with speed and if we're going to beat them we'll have to really move for sixty minutes."

Vermont has combined their speed and strength to reel off 35 Division two wins in its last 36 games, and that one loss was an overtime loss to Merrimack in the first week of the '73-'74 season.

"They're obviously a consistent team with the record they have, but in a one-shot deal like a sudden-death playoff game you can throw consistency out even if they are the best team in Division Two." said Canniff.

The game tonight could hinge on the team's goaltenders, John Kiely for Vermont, who is the better of the two, according to Canniff, and Chick Rheault for Massachusetts. Rheault has been almost unbeatable of late, and if his shoulder holds up the Minutemen could pull off an upset but it will take a tremendous team effort.

"When we play our best we can beat any team in Division Two on any given night," said the coach of the Minutemen.

In any event the Catamounts won't be taking the UMies lightly. Two years ago, when UMass won the Division Two title, Vermont faced Buffalo State at home and were upset. It's probable that the cry of "Remember Buffalo" is being heard around Burlington. A setback for Vermont tomorrow night, in their final year of Division Two play, could cause Ethan Ellen and all the Green Mountain Boys to turn over in their graves.

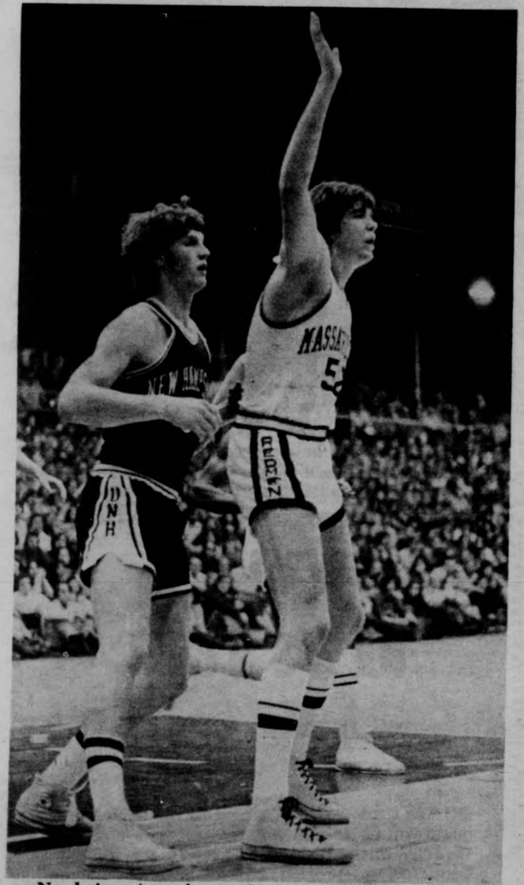
The UMass powerplay, which so far have produced lamplighters on a mere 20 per cent of power play opportunities will hope for better success in Burlington tonight. The Minutemen will have to capitalize on their opportunities if they hope to upset Vermont.



No, he's not waving to the fans. But tonight he'll be able to wave all night, for the contest between the Minutemen and UNH is almost meaningless.

UMass visits UNH in finale

By STEVE DECOSTA

If you forgot about it, you're excused.

Tonight's basketball game at New Hampshire was an easy game to forget about. It isn't listed on the schedule and it means little for the tourney-bound Minutemen.

The game was originally scheduled to be played on January 8, but was postponed when the UNH campus was shut down due to the energy shortage.

The Minutemen have little to gain in tonight's encounter, except for the fact that a record of 21-4 would look better than 20-5. There is also the matter of momentum and preparing for the NIT, which begins on March 16.

For the Wildcats, however, there is more at stake. With a victory over the conference champs, UNH would complete its most successful basketball season ever.

A Minutemen victory, on the other hand, would mark the first time a team had ever amassed eleven wins in one season in the conference. Actually, that is not as impressive as it sounds. For many years, the conference was made up of six teams and they only played ten games a year. Only with the addition of BU two years ago did the YanCon schedule encompass twelve games and allow a team to win eleven or twelve contests in any one season.

UMass played the Wildcats earlier in the year in the Cage, and thoroughly dismantled them, 72-53.

Even though tonight's game will be played at Durham, it is doubtful that the home court advantage will enable UNH to overcome the original 19 point eficit.

The big guns for the Wildcats are Wayne Morrison and Erie Feragne, two guards who have a tendency to slow the game down, and could trouble the Minutemen if they control the tempo of the game and throttle the UMass fast break.

Rich Gale, Lon Cohen, and Rick Minkiwitz round out the New Hampshire line-up.

The Wildcats are among the nations top defensive teams, but this is probably due more to their style of play than their defensive prowess. UNH plays a control game, holding the ball for that inevitable good shot. Their games are slow and tedious, with few, if any, fast breaks.

The Minutemen should be coasting as they prepare for their tournament opener. Coach Jack Leaman should clear his bench, using players sparingly without wearing anyone out.

It's a miracle

BOSTON, (DVP)---Massachusetts governor Franklin Sergeant announced today that a special program initiated after the Boston University-UMass hockey game in January has been completed.

The program, sponsored by federal disaster-relief funds, was put into operation immediately following the Minutemen's 15-1 loss to BU.

Sergeant, in announcing the end of the program, told members of the press, "I wouldn't have believed our goals could be accomplished so soon. Although I didn't see the "game" itself, I did talk to many survivors, and the consensus of opinion seemed to be that the UMass hockey program would take at least nine months to recover."

The governor's announcement came on the heels of a 7-4 UMass win over Boston State in the opening round of the ECAC Division Two playoffs. The Minutemen were the only team among the bottom four seeds to advance to the semi-final round.

"I attended the game," Sergeant continued, "disguised as an empty seat, and the improvement I saw was amazing."

Earlier in the season, and especiaaly around the time of the BU game, UMass had had a great deal of difficulty finishing off plays and scoring goals. However, during the Boston State game the Minutemen were virtually unstoppable when they had good chances.

Zack Canknife, UMass hockey coach, expressed his gratitude for the federal funds, saying "It's the only time since I've been here that anyone besides the students, a few other coaches, my wife, and the players' parents have expressed interest in the program."

Canknife could not pinpoint the reason for the UMass resurgence, saying "things just started coming together."

However, several concrete improvements can be noticed.

Chick Rheault, who had been awful against BU, has returned to his previous form and has been spectacular in recent games.

Jim Lynch, the only senior non-goaltender, has been scoring at a fast clip and providing the key goals that are expected of a veteran.

Bill Mintiens, forced into a regular defensive role because of an injury to Mike Ellis, has played steady, solid, defense.

Kevin Conners, after a long, long, scoring slump has begun to score like he can and is sparking his line, which is playing solid two-way hockey.

The disaster funds, paid in three installments, only amounted to $1.39, so Canknife has played down their importance in his team's resurgence.

"To be truthful," he said "we expected a little more money." Personally, I had hoped that we might get enough to make a down payment on a rink. As it turned out, it wasn't enought to even put a down payment on an "Official Bobby Orr NHL" table hockey game."

Sources close to the team say, however, that the federal money was at least partially responsible for the UMass win over Boston State.

Supposedly Canknife purchased $1.39 worth of Bazooka bubble gum and offered a slab to anyone scoring a goal. When Jim Lyons heard about it, he was reported to have said "There'll be no stopping me now." Lyons scored the goal early in the third period that broke the game wide open.

The Minutemen, who play Vermont tonight in the semi-finals of the playoff tournament, are going to have to go it without federal funds for the first time since late January.

"This doesn't bother me," says Canknife, "we've gone it alone before and won the whole thing, and I think we can dd it again."

They'll have to. Governor Sergeant has said that problems with the administration in Washington preclude the sending of more funds.

Springfield Hospital En CFDC

Por: Mike Kneeland

Dos estudiantes del area con la Comision de Derechos Civiles de Estados Unidos iniciaron una investigacion del Springfield Hospital Medical Center.

Mark Citron de UMass y Douglas Whelan de Hampshire College, ambos estudiantes de pre-medica, acusaron al hospital de que "ha creado condiciones que impiden que los hispanos puedan recibir un servicio medico adecuado."

La Comision Federal de Derechos Civiles en Nueva York recibio las estadisticas y observaciones de Citro y Whelan. La Comision que cubre la Region I, incluido Springfield, planea ver de cerca dicha situacion.

Citron dice que cerca del 20 por ciento de los pacientes que llegan al salon de emergencia son hispanos. Muchos no saben ingles. Citron despues de estar por dos semanas en el hospital fue 'invitado' a abandonar el mismo.

Citron cita al Dr. Miner, director del salon de emerge ciadiciendo que no es responsabilidad del hospital de tener interpretes. Y que la gente que viene a Estados Unidos debe aprender ingles o traer interpretes. De Acuerdo a Citron, el Dr. Miler le dijo que el hospital no habia encontrado personal bilingue entrenado. Al llamar Citron a la Agencia de Empleos de Springfield encontro que en dicho lugar no habian recibido ninguna informacion del hospital. Y que de haber pedido dicha clase de personal lo hubieran buscado intensamente.

Bill Schaare un vocero del Hospital de Springfield cree que el hospital esta particularmente interesado en los hispanos. Senalo como evidencia, el trabajo hecho en el Centro de Salud de Brightwood Riverview.

Schaare dice que el Centro tiene empleados del Hospital de Springfield, quienes tratan a pacientes ambulantes del area predominantemente hispana. Anadio que habian unas cuantas enfermeras que hablaban algun espanol, y tres ayudantes de salud de descendencia hispana. Y que el Centro trata de conseguir empleados que hablen espanol.

Anadio Schaare que el hospital de Springfield tiene empleados latinos, aunque como hablaba de su casa no pudo determinar la cantidad de ellos.

Whelan trabajo en el hospital por 7 meses y cito un caso en que hubo una evidente falta de comunicacion, la muerte de un nino, en la unidad pedriatica de cuidado extensivo. "Y no implico que en este caso se pudiera evitar la muerte del nino, obteniendo una historia medica immediata. Me molesta el sentimiento de impotencia y ansiedad de la abuela, que no pudo comunicarse con ninguno de los empleados de la sala de emergencias."

Citron afirmo que en efecto fue votado del hospital, porque estaba distribuyendo a los hispanos un cuestionario, que aunque fueron aprobados por el hospital inicialmente, no presentaban buenos resultados para el hospital. El dice ademas que ha oido al personal medico expresandose irrespetuosamente de los pacientes latinos.

Citron concluye que en el hospital no hay suficiente motivacion para tratar de entender el estilo de vida de los latinos.

ABOLICION ESCLAVITUD NEGRA
ABOLITION OF BLACK SLAVERY

El 22 de marzo del 1973 se abolio la esclavitud negra en Puerto Rico. El Doctor Ramon Emeterio Betances, (1827-1898), fue uno de los principales abolicionistas y gestor del Grito de Lares del 23 de septiembre del 1868. En esa fecha se proclamo la libertad de los puertorriquenos.

On March 22, 1893 Black slavery was abolished in Puerto Rico. Doctor Ramon Emeterio Betances one of the principal leaders in the abolitions movement was also the principal leader on the movement for independence that established the Republic of Puerto Rico (Sept. 23, 1868).

Bi-Lingual Education In Mass.

By LUIS MANUEL MEDINA

According to Dr. Silvia Viera, "The recognition of the language and the culture of any individual, is a recognition of his or her own personality."

In a interview held in Spanish with Dr. Viera, different facts came to light in relation to the Bilingual-Bicultural Education in Massachusetts and benefits that minorities as well as the majorities could obtain from it.

One of those benefits is the recognition of the individual personality through being aware of his-her language and culture. "Everybody conceptualizes and socializes using the native language", Dr. Viera said. She added that any individual whose language is not recognized and doesn't know the "accepted one", is pulled out of society.

According to the psychologist, a person who feels happy functions better, physically and mentally. Some of the pressures of belonging to a different culture, could be released through education and recognition of the values of that culture.

"The needs of a multi-cultural society, (as the United States is), could not be served through the uses of a monocultural education." Dr. Viera said.

She has been involved in bilingual education programs in the United States, Puerto Rico and American Virgin Islands and in Quebec, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Trinidad, Jamaica and Bolivia.

Dr. Viera is director of the Bilingual Bicultural Education Program of the School of Education. The program that began last semester to prepare bilingual teachers for the elementary schools, is developing fast. Next semester bilingual teachers will prepare for the high school level.

Three graduate students, Edward Sotolongo, Ms. Elba Rivera and Linda McCrosan, are part of the regular program's staff. The Program was created by a state law which says non-English speaking children must be taught in their native language.

The eventual "transculturation" of the students, could release many of the tension that the country has concerning cultural differences, differences which may generate other problems.

Concerning the Puerto Ricans, one of the largest non-English speaking groups in the State, Dr. Viera said, "The Puerto Ricans always had believed in the benefits of education".

According to a spokesman for the Puerto Ricans, 32 percent of the total budget of the Island is being use for public education. The total amount in dollars, however, is not known.

According to Dr. Silvia Viera, bilingual Education must be bilateral in order to be effective. "Majorities and minorities must be educated in respect to culture and the history of the other group". She added that understanding of both cultures must be met through the education and the respect (esteem) of each groups cultural values.

Editorial Comment

As a community the Spanish Americans have achieved success. In the last six semesters the Latino students have accomplished much, individually and collectively.

Even when sometimes we have experienced lack of opportunities and equality, we have maintained a sense of direction, confidence and success, because we know we represent the hopes of our communities.

Our achievements are not only ours, but the results of the cooperation of different people in the university community, with different cultures, races and life styles. Whether they be White Americans, Afro-Americans, Spanish-Americans or whatever, we are creating the bases for success and mutual understanding.

Together we are getting closer to the realization of our goals ... a better society.

To all those friends, our best wishes, and we say to them in our best Spanish ... MUCHAS GRACIAS.

I shivered blind.

Gladly would I have trumpeted a golden rood
Down an aisle strewn for queens for her
Gladly would I have sweated dark
And dug a hole in the earth for her.

Weak at the knees
I hallucinated
And slipped the mass with its options into my pants
Wondering why Thanatos
Was written over this altar, in this church
Death would have sufficed for these.

En Torno Al Cambio Educacional

by Miguel A. Rivera

Desde hace algunos anos, hemos sido bombardeados por la fiebre del cambio educacional. Cada universidad reclama para si el honor de haber parido uno o varios cambios. Los cria con la ternura imprescindible del presupuesto economico Lo bautiza publicamente, y espera el momento culminante para presentarlo a la sociedad. Se celebra, desde luego, un gran baile quinceanero en la comunidad "cientifica".

Existe la impresion de que, cuando llegamos al campo de la educacion, hay necesariamente que sentar en la picota de los acusados a toda la estructura social que lo condiciona, determina y justifica. Asi ha de ser porque lo requiere el analisis critico.

Si lo anterior es correcto, parece que proponer cambios en el sistema educacional sera necesariamente un acto de exigirlos tambien en la estructura social.

Muchos enfoques nuevos tienen la intencion de vender el mismo viejo contenido, las mismas burundangas a que hemos estado sometidos por siglos. Es un nuevo metodo de vender las viejas verduras en plazas de mercado remodeladas. La unica diferencia la constituye el uso de nombres sofisticados con precios mas altos.

En algunos casos, la mayoria de ellos, el aumento ha sido puramente cuantitativo, lo que es deseable, necesario. Claro, baja ninguna circunstancia, suficiente. Hemos experimentado cambios en la manera de ensenar. Se ha ido modernizando la educacion, tecnificandola. Se emplea la grabadora y su cinta, la television y su circuito cerrado, el "videotape", los laboratorios electronicos para los idiomas, los satelites y miles instrumentos mas. No podemos negar la necesidad de esas medidas porque la poblacion del mundo va en aumento, lo que obliga a muchos a pensar que la unica solucion es masificar la educacion. Y para lograrlo hay que utilizar las tecnicas masivas de medios de comunicacion.

Todavia cabe preguntarse si esa es la respuesta al problema educacional. Surgen, como diablos en los templos sagrados, varias dudas.

El que controla la tecnica puede imponer su cultura, su ideologia. No podemos medir todavia los efectos cualitativos producidos por la tecnica moderna en el hombre. Podemos pensar que el peligro no es el satelite, sino el mensaje. Luego, hay que concluir que quien sea dueno del satelite sera tambien el dueno del mensaje.

Como implicara Nicolas Maquiavelo en EL PRINCIPE, no estamos bregando con angeles.

Nuestra escuela ha producido ese hombre hecho a la medida de la tecnica. El graduado correcto. El hombre tornillo, amante callejero de la maquina. Creado para la maquina y ajustado a ella con cinturones de seguridad para que no se atreva a escapar.

Por otro lado, viviendo en un paiz de profundas y exajeradas contradicciones, se encuentran unas cuantas escuelas hundidas en la mania del cambio. Ciegas y locas por el amado cambio. Mi amigo Maquiavelo hubiera dicho "amado presupuesto". Estas escuelas no han producido todavia un hombre claro; pudiera decirse porque el tiempo ha sido corto.

Hay, sin embargo, otras impresiones. Algunas escuelas "modernas" han olvidado que el hombre ha de aprender. Es ahi donde se reflejan las contradicciones. Mucha laxitud para no aprender gran cosa es peor que poca libertad para no aprender gran cosa tampoco. Pero, esta segunda alternativa hace mas dano porque le permite al hombre creerse que en el ambiente libre no se aprende.

La primera situacion, aquella en la que no hay libertad para aprender, es realmente mucho mas positiva si la comparamos con la segunda porque, por lo menos, produce rebeldes. La segunda produce idiotas utiles en la permisividad.

El hombre no puede seguir escogiendo entre un mal menor y uno mayor. No se puede continuar creando un imbecil tecnificado, adorablemente quieto; electrico funcionario del engranaje, que paradogicamente lo mantiene y lo destruye en vida. Necesitamos un hombre consciente, critico y creador Un hombre creado para la pedagogia del cambio estructural. Refinar la tecnica sin refinar al hombre es crear dominadores mas eficaces.

Tal vez, haga falta una nueva concepcion de "educar". Pero, hasta que logremos un cambio de contenido, de esencia, y no de accidentes, realmente continuaremos caminando como el cangrejo: para atras.

Senadores Estudiantiles

La comunidad hispana cuenta con varios senadores en el Gobierno del Senado Estudiantil del Campus de U. Mass en Amherts.

Los companeros fueron electos como resultado de un aumento de los senadores del Tercer Mundo, que se elevo a quince el semestre pasado.

Los senadores latinos son Juan Cruz, Hector Vega y Arturo Brito.

El aumento en la representacion de estudiantes de razas y culturas minoritarias representa un gran avance, para las comunidades del Tercer Mundo y para la Universidad en general.

Otros senadores estudiantiles en esta universidad han sido Herbie Flores, Armando Morales, Jose del Valle y Edmundo Ramos.

Salud En La Comunidad

Esfuerzo y estudio empiezan a vislumbrar frutos que beneficiaran grandemente a las comunidades latinas de Western Massachusetts.

Empieza a verse un aumento de profesionales hispanos en el area que indiscutiblemente ayudan al desarrollo social, politico y cultural de los miles de hispanos que por muchos anos han carecido de servicios sociales que realmente sirvan sus necesidades.

Irma Rivera (Graduada) y Rafael Otero (subgraduado) ambos del Dpto. de Salud Publica estan llevando a cabo un cuestionario sobre el cuidado de la salud en la poblacion hispana de Springfield. El Dr. Jesse Ortiz, les sirve de consejero academico.

Ingles Como Segundo Idioma

Desde el pasado semestre existe un componente en el Departamento de Retorica, llamado English AS A Second Language, dirigido por el Dr. Tim Cabanas.

El componente ensena tres clases para preparar al estudiante hispano en lectura y escritura en ingles. Los cursos son muy importantes porque representan la base para que el estudiante esta mas preparado cuando vaya a tomar clases completamente en ingles.

Al momento aparte del Sr. Cabanas, hay dos profesores mas, el Sr. David Labiosa y el Sr. Ed Trujillo.

El semestre pasado las clases de retorica, (ingles como segundo idioma), fueron ensenadas tambien a un grupo de estudiantes hispanos en la ciudad de Worchester.

Zapatos Nuevos

La comunidad hispana del estado de Massachusetts, al igual que en otras partes de la Nueva Inglaterra conocen a Julio Torres y a Sonia Vivas a traves de su programa radial QUE TAL AMIGOS, que se transmite desde la emisora universitaria WFCR-U Mass en Amherst.

Pero hay otras tareas artisticas que han llevado a cabo que no son tan conocidas, Por ejemplo ZAPATOS NUEVOS, una pelicula de 15 minutos de duracion, sobre como es que se bate el cobre en los pueblos marginados en San Juan, Puerto Rico. La pelicula que fue hecha por Julio Torres para la Universidad de Puerto Rico en Rio Piedras, lleva un alto contenido de emocion estetica, que logra una admirable combinacion entre el arte, y el mensaje de contenido social.

Rene Marquez, en su obra LA CARRETA, presenta el problema del campesino mudandose del campo a la ciudad. Zapatos Nuevos presenta a ese campesino en la ciudad.

Los estudiantes que han tomado las clases de television con el Dr. Juan Caban de la Escuela de Educacion, han tenido la oportunidad de ver y estudiar a Zapatos Nuevos. Y creemos que se deberia ensenar a los demas estudiantes como parte de una actividad cultural y de reconocimiento a los valores artisticos de nuestra cultura.

Cursos En Espanol

El aumento que han tenido los cursos en espanol durante los ultimos anos ha sido considerable, asi como el aumento en el profesorado puertorriqueno.

De acuerdo a la Sra, Maria Simpson, den componente hispano de CCEBS, se estan ensenando alrededor de 25 cursos en espanol, que incluyen computadoras, historia de Puerto Rico, Administracion de Liderato para Minorias, Antropologia, Civilizacion Latino Americana, ect.

Ha habido un aumento en el numero de profesores puertorriquenos y cinco de ellos tienen titulo de doctorado.

Los estudiantes han expresado diversas opiniones sobre los mismos. De acuerdo a Esther Sotolongo, dichas clases le benefician porque puede practicar su espanol en un nivel academico. Esther al igual que otros estudiantes latinos que han crecido en los Estados Unidos han sido educados en ingles.

Esta opinion de Esther Sotolongo ha sido compartida tambien por los estudiantes hispanos que participaron de la conferencia de SWAP. En dicha ocasion Linda Santos, y Ruth Cardinale, expresaron que dichas clases le ayudaban a desarrollar su idioma nativo. En la misma conferencia, Olga Rodriguez, Elba Cruz y Luis Medina expresaron que las clases en espanol ayudan al estudiante a mantener su record academico mientras tiene tiempo para aprender ingles.

Jaime Santiago expresandose sobre el mismo particular dice que: "Las clases en espanol me dan confianza."

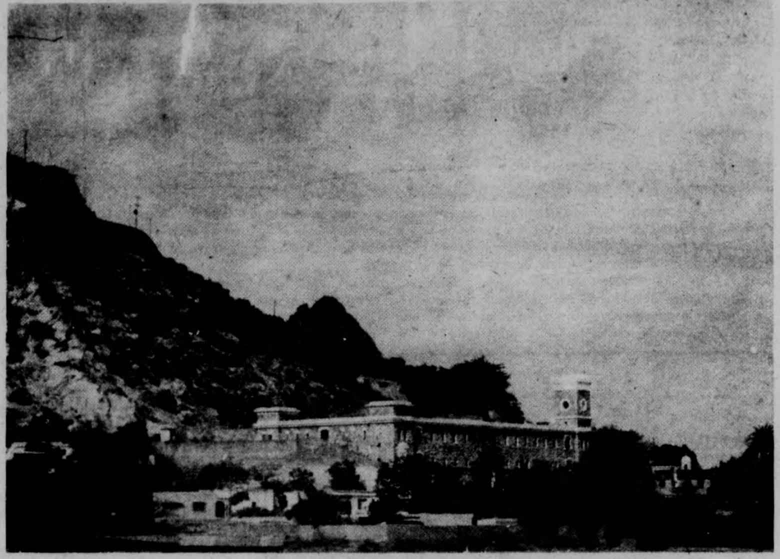
Pot In Mexico

What Happens If You Get Caught



The State Prison at Hermosillo, Sonora, Mexico

In many states in our country, the laws regarding posession of marijuana are becoming more lenient. In Canada, at present, possession of marijuana carries a maximum fine of $1,000 and up to 6 months in jail for a first offense. New legislation soon to be introduced would reduce the penalty to only a fine. These changes increase the problems Mexico already has with many North American tourists and pot.

By July of 1971, there was a total of 234 Americans in prison throughout Mexico and the number is increasing. There were 20 Americans imprisoned in the border town of Nogales, Sonora; and 80 in the state prison in Hermosillo just 177 miles further south. This is the largest American prisoner population in any U.S. Consular District abroad.

Why? Because 90 percent were arrested on drug charges. This Consular District includes the area close to the border where all the west coast traffic funnels south.

Many young people head south thinking Mexico is a haven for drug users. They believe the narcotics regulations are even more relaxed than in U.S. and if there is any question of legality, they need only to bribe the agents and they can go on their merry way. By the time they learn the facts, it is too late.

Mexican narcotics laws are rigidly enforced. Any drug charge is a federal offense and even possession in small quantities is punishable with a 2 to 9 year sentence while trafficking in narcotics means 3 to 10 years. Nor does Mexican law grant release on bail. The authorities are not sympathetic and a violator can languish in jail as long as a year before being sentenced. This can have a devastating effect on a young person.

Of the 80 Americans in the state prison at Hermosillo, 79 were there on drug charges and one was charged with counterfeiting American money ($20 bills).

One prisoner is a boy of 19 who is serving a sentence of 4 years and 2 months. He has already served 1½ years and has not had any visitors in that time. His family lives too far away and a journey to visit him is costly.

After graduating from high school, this boy spent the summer doing nothing much and it was easy to go to Guadalajara with a 26 year old acquaintance just to goof off. On their way back to the border, they were stopped at a road block and one policeman found marijuana in the car.

The older of the two Americans offered the policeman $1,000 in cash and the car if he would allow them to take a bus to the border instead of arresting them. The car and their personal effects - including clothing - were confiscated.

Under Mexican law, any vehicle which is involved in contraband drugs, is confiscated, regardless of how much or how little is found. The same law applies here in United States. .

Another American has been there 3½ months without being sentenced. He had hopes of being released quickly but later, he and his partner ran out of money for their attorney. The attorney had a little difficulty with the case; this American has been in several American prisons including San Quentin.

An attractive young American girl in her late teens decided to travel through Mexico by hitch hiking rides with fellow Americans. Three personable young men picked her up and an hour later were arrested for possession of Marijuana. She had unwittingly become an accomplice and was taken into custody. She was held 3 months before she could prove she was not part of the group even though the three said they had just given her a ride.

Many Americans, when arrested, feel they can contact the American Embassy and officials can obtain a speedy release for them. The American Consulate is forbidden by law to act as attorneys or to give legal advice. The members of the consulate can offer moral support and can refer the accused to competent attorneys.

The suspect first appears before the Agent of Public Ministry (District Attorney) where he can be held for 24 hours while the Agent determines if there is a case or not.

If there is a case, the accused is consigned to a court and goes to the federal or state prison. During the next 72 hours, the accused will give his preliminary statement to the judge who informs him of the charges. The judge's final decision, in this 72 hour period, will be a writ of dismissal or a writ of formal prison.

If the maximum penalty for the crime does not exceed a two year prison term, the suspect will be judged before 4 months. If the maximum penalty exeeeds two years, the suspect can be held up to one year before judgment. The time during which the suspect is held, is credited to the length of the sentence.

BRUJERIA MODERNA

Por Juan Garrastegui

Aquello de la bruja que dejaba su cuerpo y salía disparada por una ventana a cometer diabluras por el mundo, o del mago que leía el porvenir en una bola de cristal, está adquiriendo en la actualidad fundamento científico.

Investigadores en parasicología de universidades americanas y europeas han verificado la telepatía, la clarividencia, y otros fenómenos de percepción extrasensorial. Ciertas personas parecen poseer un sexto sentido que les permite percibir las cosas más allá de sus sentidos corporales, trasmitir su pensamiento a otras personas, y predecir acontecimientos futuros. En menor escala, ese oculto sentido opera en la mayoría de la gente en forma de intuición que resuelve un problema, sueño que se realiza, o presentimiento de algo sucedido o por suceder.

Los "mediums" que se utilizan en los experimentos creen que sus raras facultades se debe a la intervención de espíritus desencarnados, pero los científicos no han podido aún aislar ese factor entre la maraña de reacciones psicológicas envueltas en el proceso. Hallando muchas reacciones que no tienen explicación por los criterios y métodos conocidos, han optado por aceptar la hipótesis de que pudiera haber envuelto el ente inmaterial, y han organizado una poderosa asociación que se dedica al estudio del supuesto fenómeno.

Entrenamiento De Liderato

La clase mas innovativa que se esta ensenando este semestre en espanol, probablemente sea Administracion de Liderato Para Minorias, ensenada por el Sr. Eduardo Sotolongo de la Escuela de Educacion.

La misma consta de numerosos ejercicios tendientes a desarrollar el liderato latino dentro de la universidad, y el crear una dinamica de grupo que ayude a trabajar con mayor objetividad en la obtencion de logros que beneficien al estudiantado al igual que a las comunidades latinas.

Proteja Su Salud

Servicio Gratuito Para Estudiantes Hispanos

La Universidad ofrece servicios medicos a los estudiantes Estos servicios se aumentaran para los estudiantes hispanos ofreciendoles servicios de laboratorio que normalmente no se hacen en el centro de salud.

El Dr. Jesse Ortiz estara a cargo de este programa. Se ofreceran las siguientes pruebas:

1 - Analisis de excretas, (Evaluacion parasitologica completa).

2 - Analisis de orina (Diabetis, proteina, nefritis).

3 - Analisis de sangre, (anemia, nivel de anticuerpos contra parasitos).

Esta es una gran oportunidad para que los estudiantes puedan resolver los problemas que afectan su salud. Los estudiantes con analisis positivos seran enviados al servicio de salud, (enfermeria), donde se les dara el tratamiento adecuado. Los estudiantes interesados en estos servicios deben ver o llamar por telefono al Dr. Jesse Ortiz, (Oficina 228 A Public Health Building-Morrill, telefono 545-0814.

Estos servicios de laboratorio tambien se ofrecen a las familias de los estudiantes hispanos. El tratamiento medico gratuito solo se ofrece a los que estan asegurados con los Servicios de Salud de la Universidad, los demas deben ver a sus medicos propios cuando el analisis de positivo.

Nixon claims never ok'd silence payoffs

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon said Wednesday night he never authorized any payoffs or clemency to silence Watergate defendants, declaring that he told top aides a year ago that would be wrong.

"I know what I said, I know what I meant, I know what I did," the President declared.

Nixon thus supported the testimony of his former top aide H.R. Haldeman, indicted for perjury for quoting the President as saying last March 21 that payoffs would be wrong.

He told a nationally televised and broadcast news conference that others reading transcripts or hearing tapes of the March 21 conversation night reach different conclusions.

"But I know what I meant: I meant the whole transaction was wrong," he said.

Nixon offered sworn testimony, in writing or before top members of the House Judiciary Committee, in its impeachment inquiry. He said he wants to speed that process, and is confident the panel will not find him guilty of impeachable crimes.

He repeated his lawyers' offer to turn over to the committee all tapes and documents provided to the Watergate grand jury. But the President said he would not provide masses of White House material for the committee to "paw through in a fishing expedition."

The President said he has no intention of offering clemency to former aides now facing criminal action because of Watergate, although he did not rule out clemency because of persoanl tragedy or other individual situations.

It was his second news conference in nine days, and his first public discussion of the issues raised by the indictment last Friday of seven former administration or political aides.

The disputed Haldeman testimony was a central point. Haldeman told the Senate Watergate committee that the President had said on March 21 that $1 million could be raised to pay off defendants "but it would be wrong."

That contested statement, and Nixon's public statement, thus are in agreement.

Nixon said it would be improper for him to comment on the indictments. But he discussed in detail the March 21 meeting with Haldeman and then-White House counsel John W. Dean III.

He said Dean told him then, for the first time, that Watergate defendants had received payments for their silence. Nixon said he told Dean that money alone wouldn't work, that it would have to be linked with clemency, and that both would be wrong.

Now when individuals read the entire transcript of the meeting or hear the entire tape where we discussed all these options, they may reach different interpretations," Nixon said.

But I know what I meant and I know what I did. I meant that the whole transaction was wrong, the transaction for the purpose of keeping this whole matter covered up."

The President also:

—Said "I also stopped beating my wife" when a questioner asked whether perjury or obstruction of justice would be an impeachable offense. But, he added, "I don't believe the House committee will find the President guilty of any of these crimes."

—Declared "the back of the energy crisis has been broken,"

Rev. Jesse Jackson spoke last night at Amherst College.

Jackson derides portrayal of Blacks in American media

By DONALD WILHELM

Rev. Jesse Jackson, noted civil rights activist and co-worker of Martin Luther King, delivered an emotion-packed speech to a large crowd at Amherst College's Johnson Chapel last night.

Jackson to an extent emphasized the Black's progress in civil rights, rather than their problems.

"George Wallace said a Black girl couldn't go to the University of Alabama. Martin Luther King said she could. Ten years later George Wallace crowned a Black girl Homecoming Queen." He also said that the civil rights movement is over, because we won, and it never has been told by the press, but we challenged them and we won."

Jackson said the media are virtual puppets of the White power structure, giving a distorted picture of Blacks in America. He said this extended to movies, television, and advertising.

Jackson gave as an example, "A cheap horror movie will take a magnifying glass and turn an ant into a monster. Similarly, today's Black pictures magnify Blacks into pimps, robbers, rapists, and shiftless lazy bums. But most Blacks are honest and work hard, and get paid a lot less than Whites do."

Jackson, giving his speech in connection with the Amherst College Black Business Symposium, said that economic progress was the key to progress.

"The Black man has the right to buy a house in any neighborhood in America. But he can't afford it." Jackson said.

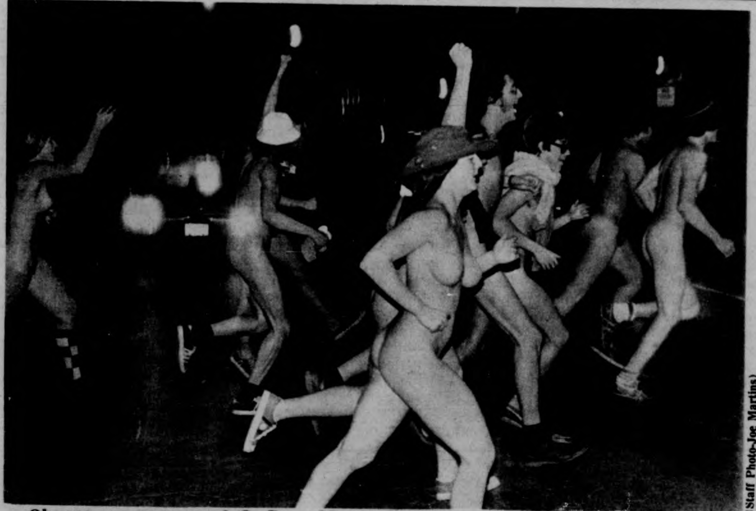
He said that Blacks have to build themselves economically to take advantage of their legal gains.

Jackson noted that 85 per cent of the workers at Zenith television plant, 55 per cent of the workers at a Budd railroad car plant, and large majorities in steel and auto plants are Black. The power of numbers in such businesses can effect a lot of change. Rev. Jackson added, "Whether you're Black, Jewish, giant or midget, the only protection against genocide is to remain neccessary. Pimps. robbers, and hustlers aren't necessary."

Jackson emphasized the importance of African Studies Departments in colleges. Blacks often have to take courses such as Shakespeare and Western Civilization, but Whites don't have to take courses on Black culture and history. And Blacks often get educationally chanelled into powerless occupations.

"It is not enough to play baseball — you have to be able to count the receipts from the game." Jackson said.

Let's streak around the block tonight!



(Staff Photo-Joe Martins)

Oh say can you see...? Or-Dear Mom... Or-When what to my wondering eyes should appear... Or-By the light of the silvery moons... Or---

By BOB SCHEIER

A crowd of at least 250 streakers took a 40-minute, two mile nude run around the campus last night before returned to Southwest to claim they had captured the world streaking record.

The streakers, wearing party hats, neckties, an occasional t-shirt, and most often nothing at all, emerged from the lobby of John Adams around 9:20 to the cheers, clicking cameras, and applause of around 2,000 students.

Several hundred spectators were led on a wild chase across campus as the streakers who included at least 25 women made their way from Southwest, to the campus pond, Orchard Hill, Central, Northeast, and through the Campus Center concourse in 46 degree weather.

When the streakers finally staggered into Southwest again, about 1,000 people gathered around John Adams to hear a student on a bullhorn announce an "official" count of 475 streakers which he said broke the world's record.

"I just had to be in on a tie-breaking thing," said one streaker as he puffed his way from North Pleasant St. towards the campus center.

Another streaker, dressed only in a brown raincoat and shoes, stopped to catch his breath near the campus pond. When asked why he streaked, he thought for a moment and said "The motive eludes me...it's a kind of a mass shock thing..."

Another streaker, fully clothed after his arrival back in Southwest, said he was graduating next year "...and I wanted to do something worthwhile besides learn some thing..." He said he was calling the Dept. of Public Safety because he had locked his valuables and keys inside his car.

Streakers reported no harassment from either onlookers or campus police.

When the panting streakers finally entered the Campus Center concourse, the smell of sweat and the sounds of fictory chants filled the jam-packed concourse.

At least 400 people had jammed every inch of the concourse, standing on the information booth and tables to gape at the streakers.

As the line of naked bodies jogged through Northeast, some of them seemed to make their way through Leach House before streaming across North Pleasant st. back towards the campus center.

"Okay, off with the clothes..." someone yelled through a bullhorn.

"It'll probably decline after this," puffed one streaker. "We just wanted to break the record."

But David L. Johnston, director of the public safety dept., said he thought streaking would continue till the end of the semester.

"Generally, our whole concern was crowd and traffic control," said Johnston, who said Monday that the department was taking a "relaxed line" with the activity. The department had run into some traffic problems on North Pleasant St. and Mass. Ave., he said.

"Generally, a fun evening was had by all," Johnston said. "Nothing surprises me too much after 15 years at law enforcement."

Twenty women poets to read works at festival next week

Twenty women poets will read from their works and participate in workshops during the first National Women's Poetry Festival next week at UMass.

A schedule of events for the week will appear in tomorrow's Below The Salt.

Participating poets will be:

Gwendolyn Brooks, Pulitzer Prize-winning poet and Poet Laureate of Illinois, author and editor of more than a dozen books dealing mainly with the Black.

Adrienne Rich, winner of the Yale Younger Poets Award for her book "A Change of World" and author of four other books.

Three local women poets: Shirley Kaufman who teaches creative writing at UMass; Sonia Sanchez, a teacher at Amherst College and Anne Halley, a teacher at Holyoke Community College.

Robin Morgan, co-founder of women's newspaper, RAT; co-founder of New York Radical Women and founder of WITCH, she has written a number of articles and poems and three books.

Erica Jong, whose two poetry collections, "Fruits and Vegetables" and "Half-Lives" have won her several awards. She is also the author of "Fear of Flying."

Audre Lorde, who has published three collections of poetry including "Cables of Rage", and poems in more than 20 publications.

Pineapple Whitcomb, a poet from Ohio who has worked with the Farm Labor Organizing Committee.

Mari Evans, whose book "I Am a Black Woman," received the Indiana University's Writers' Conference Award for the most distinguished work of poetry published by an Indiana author and the Black Academy of Arts and Letters first annual poetry award. Her poetry has been used on record albums and she is also the author of several children's books.

Suni Paz, a Latin American folk artist and songwriter.

Carolyn Rodgers, a member of the Organization of Black American Culture and winner of the first Conrad Kent Rivers Writing Award.

Susan Sherman, author of two poetry collections and "With Anger-With Love", selections of prose and poetry.

Marge Piercy, author of "Going Down East" and two other works of fiction and of four poetry collections including "Hard Loving."

Lucille Clifton, author of "Good Times", "Good News About the Earth" and "An Ordinary Woman" and 10 children's books.

Marge Piercy contemplates a theme for her poetry.

Carolyn Kizer, founder of the poetry quarterly, "Poetry Northwest" and Poet-In-Residence at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Margaret Walker, author of "For My People", "Jubilee" and "Prophets for a New Day" and poetry contributor to a number of anthologies and other publications.

Also, Tomia Arai, Fay Chiang and Nerle Okada.

Chief to explain African view of God

By MICHAEL PATTERSON
Black News Service

Chief Nana Kobina, a Paramount Chief of the Fante in Africa, said he would explain fully the African conception of God in his speech tonight. The lecture titled, "The Black World Speaks: Where do we go from here?", will begin at 7:30 in room 120 of the School of Business Administration.

Only four third world people were present at the lecture last Thursday, titled, "Missionaries, Missionaries, Missionaries." The vast majority of the audience was Caucasion. Chief Nketsa's message, while it could be understood by Caucasions was for and about black people.

He began his speach by citing to the audience how Europeans perceived African culture and civilization. He did this by reading from various texts written by noted European philosophers and scholars about African people. These texts were written in the period from the 16th to 19th centuries. Today, the texts sound like the statements of some mad racist ignorant fool. But in their day these statements reflected the way most thought and felt about African people and their American descendants.

According to these scholars, black people had no culture, no history and no potential for development. Chief Kobina then proceeded to explain, some little known facts about African culture and history.

Chief Kobina told us of how Europeans were amazed to find out that African doctors could cure diseases they were incapable of curing using their own secret methods.

He also explained while the missionaries that came to the African continent thought Africans to be pagan and spiritually underdeveloped, the Africans, in fact, had a spirituality equal to if not more developed than the Europeans.

The European missionaries, it seems were so inflated with the importance of their own religions that their minds were unable to perceive the African conception of God which is foreign to the Western mind. Many things that westerners dismiss as myth or superstition are proven realities in the east.

The Fante believe that God is always creating through scientists, artists, songwriters and poets. And that these peoples' minds are just an extension of God. They hold certain instruments sacred. Among these are the drum and the loom.

Nana Kobina Nketsia IV, is chairman of the board of directors, Ghana Film Corporation. During the regime of Kwame Nkrumah he served as Director, Ghana Institute of Art and Culture, and as Ambassador-at-large concerning questions of African unity.

He has academic degrees from Oxford University and is currently a professor of Anthropology at Hampshire College, and an Adjunct Professor of African Culture in the Dubois Department of Afro-American Studies at UMass.

UMass given grant for English seminar

By JANE MARINO
MDC Staff

The National Endowment for the Humanities (NEH) has awarded a grant of $44,481 to UMass for a seminar in the discipline of English entitled, "Writing in the First College Years", announced Dr. Ronald S. Berman, Chairman of the Humanities Endowment.

Twelve college teachers will participate in the seminar directed by Professor Walker Gibson of the Department of English here. They will study the act of composition and will seek to relate scholarship in linguistics, criticism, and even physical science with day-to-day activity in the freshman-sophomore classroom. In addition, participants will be expected to carry on independent research using the resources of the University library.

This seminar is part of the Humanities Endowment's program of summer seminars which is providing $1.3 million to 24 colleges and universities in support of 34 seminars for 400 college teachers in 1974. Begun during the summer of 1973, the program of summer seminars provides teachers at smaller colleges and junior and community colleges with opportunities to work for two months in their area of interest with distinguished scholars at institutions which have libraries suitable for mature study.

The National Endowment for the Humanities is a Federal agency established in 1965 to stimulate scholarship and public interest in the humanities. The Endowment makes grants through its divisions of Research, Fellowships, Education, Public Programs, and through its Office of Planning.

Feature film to be shot here

(AP) - Representatives of a Hollywood film studio are scouting possible sites for a feature film to be shot in part in the Connncticut Valley.

"The Reincarnation of Peter Proud" will be filmed in the area for five weeks beginning in June, according to Hal W. Polaire, a production manager, and Cary O'Dell, an art director, by Bing Crosby Productions.

They are in Northampton to arrange for locations for the film which is about a Los Angeles professor who dreams of returning to a small New England community after his death.

A by-line was left out under a story in yesterday's Collegian. The story, "'Piano Plunker' Blake Going Strong at 91," was written by MDC staff writer Avis Yuni. The mistake was made by the newspaper printer in Ware.

WMUA: of, by and for the students

By DEAN MERCHANT

"WMUA, the UMass radio station is owned and operated by the students," and, according to Tom Jodka the station's program director," uses a free-form, informative format which equals a progressive radio style." He said their style could be compared to WBCN of Boston.

"The station runs 365 days a year and is on about 154 hours a week shut down from 2 a.m. to 6 a.m., except for Saturday night," Jodka said.

He said, "we do have basic F.C.C. regulations to follow, but basically do what we want. No advertising gives us a free hand and we have control over all the programming."

"The station has been heard as far away as Hartford, Albany and into Vermont," Jodka said.

According to Jodka the format contains a mixture of all types of music, and "killowatt stereo also puts the station ahead of others."

He said he feels WMUA gets a good response from the students especially the serials — "Moon Over Morrocco,".

John Harrington, a news staff member for WMUA said "the news department is trying to stress local reporting as it is easy to rely on just the wire services."

Jodka added: "WMUA has UPI and AP teletypes but now uses more local items. "The reporting is getting continually better, he said, and we cover more things locally such as the meetings on mass transit, Sen. Lowell Weicker's visit to UMass, and campus strikes"."

"WMUA is doing a lot more public affairs and getting more sophisticated as a college station," Jodka said. "Since two years ago, the station has become bigger, and most people now treat it as a radio station rather than a club," he said.

All the funds for the station are allocated by the student senate. WMUA costs $50,000 a year to operate. Jodka said since students run the station many more people are needed than a professional radio station, because students have classes to attend.

"I personally believe that WMUA is the most democratic radio station in the Pioneer Valley without any other station coming up to our standards," Jodka said.

He added that more women are now working for WMUA than ever before — in all areas of production. He said 50 to 70 is the largest number of people that work for WMUA at any given time and there are about 18 to 20 discjockeys.

Jodka, a mass communications major, is responsible for everything that goes on the air along with picking the discjockeys.

"I've grown a whole lot working here in this position and it is a lot of fun and hassles at the same time," said Jodka. "I do this for personal enjoyment."

John Harrington, a mass communications major, said he has been working for WMUA for two years.

"Its good experience if your going into the field after college," he said. "In my opinion WMUA is far ahead of our illustrious communications department because for the communications student it really offers nothing for a university of this size as they don't even offer a radio course."

Janet P. Rome, another newsperson, said the work is personally gratifying. "You have to assume a sense of responsibility. You are your own person with the news depending on you," she said.

Gary Mcauliffe, WMUA's chief engineer spends a good 30 hours a week involved with the station. Mcauliffe is in charge of maintaining all equipment, installations, and keeping the station on the air.

"I've been taught a lot about production and my knowledge of electronics has greatly expanded," said Mcauliffe. "It was my hobby before, but now I take it very seriously."

Mcauliffe said generally things work because of preventive maintenance. He also works part time for WMAS and WHVY radio in Springfield and is involved in volunteer work as a part time enginner at WGBY T.V., channel 57 in Springfield.

Mcauliffe said the station was "one of the best places to learn about radios and the experience at WMUA has really helped me in outside areas."

"I handle the administration, letter writing and am liason with the university ect." said Jack Harper WMUA's station manager. Harper is a communication studies major and has been with WMUA for one and a half years.

According to Harper, WMUA is "open to every student on campus." He said that those that want information can come down to WMUA and talk with the staff.

A look at the gay life

By DONNA A. DIODATI
MDC Staff

What rights do Gays have? How are they treated in their academic communities?

The Collegian looks into the matter with the first of a three part series. Other articles will deal with gays at the University of New Hampshire and Maine.

Students interviewed, except for two, requested for privacy reasons that only their first name be used.

"People 'in the closet' should be less fearful of 'coming out.' There's plenty of support. UMass is an easy place to be gay, as opposed to UNH," a member of the Gay Women's Caucus said recently in a Collegian interview.

Jenny, a freshman from the Liberation Corridor in Dickinson, was one of several gay students contacted in an effort to contrast the situation at UMass with those of the University of New Hampshire and the University of Maine. Gay students at those two schools recently have met with administrative and-or legislative opposition to their organizing.

At UMass, there are two student homosexual organizations: the Student Homophile League and the Gay Women's Caucus. Both are Recognized Student Organizations funded by the Student Senate. SHL has an office in Room 413 of the Student Union. The Gay Women's Caucus will be opening its headquarters in the same building soon.

The SHL membership, according to Demian, producer of "Gay Break" on WMUA, is overwhelmingly male. No record of numbers is kept, but he estimates that there are probably 2500 homosexuals at UMass, based on Dr. Alfred Kinsey's findings. Speaking of the four-year-old SHL, Demian said: "An open organization is a very important thing. Things like dances, the gay hotline, gay peer counseling, and the speakers' bureau are important. People can drop in and relate to other people for support."

"...I feel there are a lot organizational problems" added Todd, another SHL member.

Serving the needs of lesbians on campus, the newly-reorganized Gay Women's Caucus has a membership between four and twenty, but with much fluctuation, according to Jenny, who commented: "I see the Gay Women's Caucus as having two purposes: 1. to break down stereotypes, and 2. to provide counseling and a supportive environment.

"The SHL isn't functioning for women. It's not directed toward women," she added.

Nancy Schroeder, gay counselor at the Southwest Resource Center, facilitates workshops "with women in sexism classes and other groups where straight women learn they have a lot in common with gay women." She feels that gay oppression is often not taken seriously enough. "A stated policy of Southwest is to hire non-sexist and non-racist people. It should also include non-gay oppressive."

Ellen, a counselor in Mackimmie, said that, generally, "there is no effort to find the gay perspective in residence halls. In my dorm, however, there's a positive attitude toward being gay. It's positive; not just O.K." Calling the SHL "very sexist," she added that "lesbians have benefited more from the Women's Movement than from any gay organization."

In reference to the difficulty facing gay students at UNH and UMaine, Ellen commented:,"At UNH, it's obviously horrible. It's true that we (at UMass) may be one or two steps ahead..but just because it's better here doesn't mean it shouldn't be improved."

"At UNH, there's an ignorance of how gays feel...," added Todd.

Demian felt that the "implication is disastrous," and that "anti-human feeling is the real problem."

The gay students interviewed seemed generally pleased with the administration's attitude here, however. Demian called it "tolerant," while Patty, a Mackimmie resident, said: "The administration doesn't find gay life a threat. They find it more an outlet."

"I don't know whether they just accept it passively or if it's Massachusetts liberalism," Jenny added.

An attitude less frequently considered is that of "straight" students toward their gay counterparts. Chris, an SHL member, commented: "Many think we shouldn't get money (from the Student Senate) because of our supposed activities. Most still maintain we're deviants. It (homosexuality) still gets taught as a perversion."

"We're thought of as students first, gays second...I think it's fairly liberal..." was Todd's viewpoint.

Most gay students interviewed agreed that straight people at UMass should become more informed about homosexuality. Chris feels strongly that gays should take the first step: "coming out of the closet." Then, he says, "the straight must hold his tongue until he learns; the gay must take the time to explain. One must interact with the other. Then he should ask: 'Was I taught this or do I really believe this? The more gays hide, the more straights will think they're ashamed."

Jenny sees information about homosexuality and gay students as being transmitted most effectively by using several means. "Do it through the media, through organizations like the SHL and Gay Women's Caucus, and the speakers' bureau ... You aren't going to destroy stereotypes and drive out straight people's fears in an hour, but an impact is made...'Gay Break' is a really good way to reach everybody..."

Demian added: "Gay liberation is a consciousness-raising movement. It works in two directions: it liberates people who feel drawn to their own sex and, hopefully, provides a way for those who are not to understand the others...Everybody is part of the human family. People should not be put in 'boxes'...That's a means of escaping dealing with people."

Outreach almost outta room

A greater student turnout than expected has forced the Outreach Staff to possibly limit the number of student placements. Susan Rivest, Publicity Coordinator for the program, says she expects to have about 300 applications for an estimated 250 positions.

Rivest advises "stragglers" to "hurry up and straggle in" for an interview appointment with Outreach officials.

Last semester Outreach placed about 145 students in various positions. "No way did we expect this many applicants this year" she told the Collegian. She said the high turnout could probably be attributed to increased publicity the program has received and the good evaluations of students who participated in the program.

The Student Internship Program (CSIP) provides an opportunity for students to earn 15 academic credits for participating in federal, state or local community service.

Student Senate considers energy conservation committee

By LAWRENCE KORNFELD
MDC Staff

A lack of Student input into energy conservation on campus has forced the University Energy Conservation Committee to ask the Student Senate to form a student committee for energy conservation.

They first requested this at the beginning of last semester, but the Senate is just starting to form a sub-committee of Rents and Fees to deal with the issue.

Ed Sunderland, Chairman of the University committee, is anxious the new committee get under way. He feels a committee of students will have a much greater effect in getting students to cut back energy usage.

Rick Savini, also on the committee, sees the main function of the committee as "keeping the students from becoming the brunt of energy conservation." He considers the effect of the present committee to be "zilch." However, he admits he has not attended most of the meetings.

The Student Senate, responsible for selecting someone to represent them on the University committee, has not sent anyone to replace Savini.

Ed Sunderland says the committee's ideas have been "received very well by Whitmore." He adds that cutbacks made at the recommendation of the committee will save UMass $200,000 a year if they remain implemented.

Doug McCallum, a student on the committee, says it "should do more than what it's doing now." He sees the main problems with the committee as being a lack of power and isolation from the students. Both committees have the power to make recommendations.

Grechko doesn't want Soviet in East-West detente

By STEPHENS BROENING
Associated Press Writer

MOSCOW (AP) Soviet Defense Minister Andrei Grechko says that the Soviet Union should remain wary of East-West detente and increase spending on its military night.

In an article written for the current issue of the Communist party's theoretical journal "Kommunist," the marshal declared that "the aggressive forces of imperialism must constantly feel we are always on the alert."

The prominent display given Grechko's call for vigilance seemed to be further indication that influential men in the Soviet leadership view party leader Leonid I. Brezhnev's opening to the West with some apprehension.

Publication of the article, entitled "V. I. Lenin and the Armed Forces of the Soviet State," coincided with resumption in Geneva of Soviet-American strategic arms limitation talks SALT.

"At present," Grechko wrote, "due to the efforts of the Soviet Union...relaxation of tension in relations between countries with different social systems in being outlined on our planet.

"However," he adds, "these changes do not suit those in the reactionary circles of imperialism who are still rather numerous and possess significant strength.

"They continue to disseminate lies and slander toward the socialist countries, aspire to poison the international atmosphere, hinder the improvement of the situation and return the world to the times of the Cold War.

"This puts a great responsibility on the Soviet armed forces. They understand that despite some weakening of international tension, the threat of war has not been completely eliminated."

The marshal said "imperialist reaction" has not started a new world war because of the "increasing economic and defense might of our state and its armed forces."

"In order for peace to be established on the whole planet, for the Soviet people to build communism, it is also necessary henceforth to strengthen the defense capacity of the country and increase the military power of the army and navy," he said.

British coal miners accept pay package

LONDON (AP) — The leaders of Britain's 280,000 striking coal miners Wednesday night accepted a one-year, $230 million pay package designed to end the nation's gravest industrial crisis since World War II.

The 27-man executive of the miners' union voted 25 to 2 to accept the deal after 12 hours of bargaining with the state-run coal board.

Ending the strike and resuming the flow of coal that fires 70 per cent of the country's power-permitting cancellation of the three-day work week now imposed on many British firms and factories — was the first order of business for Prime Minister Harold Wilson's new Labor government.

Joseph Gormley, president of the union, said the men would go back to the mines by Monday after a bitter dispute that has dragged on for nearly four months and hamstrung the economy.

While leaders of the miners and National Coal Board were thrashing out the pay settlement, lawmakers assembled in the two houses of Parliament for traditional swearing-in ceremonies.

"It is going to be an exciting Parliament for all of us," Wilson told the crowded chamber from his place in the government benches that had been occupied since 1970 by former Conservative Prime Minister Edward Heath.

Wilson's minority government, with 301 places in the 635-seat House of Commons, faces parliamentary struggles in the months ahead. The Conservatives have 296 seats, the Liberal party 14 and smaller parties a total of 24.

Wilson thus will need help from the Liberals to get legislation passed. Under the British system, he would not necessarily fall with the defeat of a particular bill unless he lost a confidence vote,

Senate extends cancer research

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee approved unanimously Wednesday a $2.7 billion, three-year extension of the research program to try to find the causes of and a cure for cancer.

The funds are sharply increased from the $1.6 billion provided in the first three years of the program when it was started in 1971.

The allotment for the first year of the extension period — fiscal 1975 beginning this July 1 — would be $800 million, or $200 million more than President Nixon asked.

The Committee added to the bill a provision sponsored by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., in response to fears of many scientists that other government health research programs are suffering because of the heavy emphasis on cancer.

Meir, Dayan will stay

JERUSALEM (AP) - Premier Golda Meir and Defense Minister Moshe Dayan reversed decisions to quit Israel's new government yesterday amid reports of a Syrian buildup on the Golan front.

But no crisis, tension or military buildup was visible on the Golan Heights, where Israeli and Syrian tanks battled during the October war, Israel's state radio reported.

Dayan, however, was quoted as saying he agreed to remain Israil' defense boss because of a "new security situation...to help overcome the crisis."

He flew to the Golan Heights by helicopter to inspect the front.

The state radio said "intelligence information had been received indicating that the Syrians were planning aggressive action." Israeli newspapers headlined unidentified foreign reports of Syrian troop concentrations on the 40-mile Golan front and a new Soviet arms airlift.

The Israeli military command, in a statement repeated in every hourly radio newscast, said the Golan Heights front was calm.

The crisis reports ended a 65-day political crisis. Until Tuesday night, Dayan had refused to join Mrs. Meir's cabinet and Mrs. Meir herself had made no final decision on whether to retire or remain premier.

Some Israelis suggested the Golan reports were a device for the government to end the political crisis without losing face. But one Western diplomat noted, "It couldn't be a fraud. In a society as open as this it would be revealed right away."

Mrs. Meir announced she would lead the new government following an urgent top secret cabinet meeting in Jerusalem Tuesday night.

Radio Israel said the cabinet was briefed by Dayan, chief of staff. Lt. Gen. David Elazar and Maj. Gen. Eliahu Zeira, head of military intelligence.

Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's latest Mideast peace efforts have aimed at separating Israeli and Syrian forces on the Golan front, the way Israel and Egypt disengaged on the Suez Canal. Israel's failure to put together a new government could have hampered the Syrian-Israeli talks arranged by Kissinger to be held in Washington later this month.

Senate votes to kill pay raises

WASHINGTON (AP) - Election-year pay raises for Congress members, federal judges and top executive branch officials were voted down by the Senate yesterday.

A resolution of disapproval carried by a 69 to 28 vote.

No House action is necessary. The Senate vote was enought to kill the salary increases President Nixon had included in the budget he submitted to Congress.

Leading supporters of the pay raises said many of their Senate colleagues had told them privately they agreed with them but were unable to vote with them.

The key vote was on substituting the resolution of disapproval for one the Senate Post Office and Civil Service Committee had recommended providing for killing only the congressional salary increases.

Once the substitute was adopted, the final vote on passage was 72 to 26.

The Senate cleared the way earlier in the day for the showdown by voting 67 to 31, one more than the required two-thirds majority, to put its debate limitation - rule into effect.

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, who had threatened to fulibuster against the resolution of disapproval, protested that the debate cutoff was ordered before the Senate had a chance to consider compromises he intended to offer.

But Sen. Robert P. Griffin, R-Mich., did get a vote on a proposal to cut only senators out of the pay raises. It was rejected 80 to 18.

Under a 1967 law, the pay raises Nixon proposed of 7.5 per cent for three years automatically would have taken effect at midnight Saturday unless disapproved by the Senate or the House.

The increases were less than the $45,700 this year, $49,100 next year and $52,800 in 1976 recommended to the President by a special commission provided for by the 1967 law as a way of removing from Congress the setting of its own pay.

But the law hasn't worked as intended, and after the vote Republican Leader Hugh scott said, "We failed to do justice for others because we feared to do justice for ourselves."

Victors in special elections differ on Watergate influence

by THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Republican Robert J. Lagomarsino of California said yesterday his election to Congress was a personal triumph-not a victory for the GOP or President Nixon. Democrat Thomas A. Luken of Ohio, the other winner in Tuesday's special elections, said his success showed that people were concerned about the administration.

The contests were the third and fourth special elections this year. Democrats won the two earlier seats, including the one formerly held by Vice President Gerald Ford.

Lagomarsino, 47, got 53 per cent of the total vote cast in California's 13th Congressional District and avoided a runoff with any of his seven Democratic opponents.

"We have not said this should be considered a victory for the party or the President," Lagomarsion commented. "It was a victory for me."

In Ohio's 1st District, where Nixon got 67 per cent of the vote in 1972, Luken, 48, scored an upset over Republican Willis D. Gradison Jr., becoming only the fourth Democratic representative from the district this century. He won with an unofficial count of 55,171-51,057 as about 51 per cent of the registered voters cast ballots.

Luken downplayed Watergate in his campaign, stressing the economy as a major issue. But all the elections have been carefully watched by national party leaders as barometers of public sentiment over the scandal.

"I believe the voters of the 1st District of Ohio have expressed their concern about the nature of this administration and our society," said Luken, who filled a seat vacated when Republican William Keating resigned to become president of the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Gradison called Watergate "one of many factors".

Lagomarsino fills the seat of the late Rep. Charles M. Teague, a Republican who represented the area for 19 years.

The unofficial ballot counting gave Lagomarsion 53,078 votes. The nearest opponent, Ojai Mayor James Loebel, had 18,791. The rest of the Democratic field got 27,834 votes.

Lagomarsion said his election was "an indication that people will vote for a Republican if they think he is the best man."

Nixon vetoes energy bill; objects to price rollback

WASHINGTON (AP) - President Nixon vetoed the Emergency Energy Act yesterday, declaring that it "solves none of the problems, threatens to undo the progress we have already made and creates a host of new problems."

His veto sent the legislation back to Congress, where it would become law only if the veto is overridden by a two-thirds vote in each house.

The Senate scheduled a late afternoon vote on the possible override.

The House passed the bill last week, but the vote for the measure was less than the two-thirds that would be needed to override.

In his five-page veto message Nixon repeated the arguments against the bill which he and White House officials have made previously.

The President objected most vigorously to the bill's provision for a rollback in domestic crude oil prices.

Such a rollback, he said, would make the oil industry "unable to sustain its present production of petroleum products, including gasoline. It would result in reduced energy supplies, longer lines at the gas pump, minimal, if any, reduction in gasoline prices, and worst of all, serious damage to jobs in America."

"Unemployment would go up, and incomes would go down," Nixon said.

The net effect would, he continued, "make compulsory rationing of gasoline much more likely."

The President also objected to the bill's provision for unemplyment payments to persons losing their jobs as a result of the energy situation.

"The government would be saddled with the impossible task of determining whether the unemployment of each of the nation's jobless workers is 'energy related.' In addition eligibility for those benefits would not take into account the availability of jobs in the area" the President declared.

He also objected to a provision providing low interest loans to homeowners and small businesses to finance installation of storm windows and heating units. He said the program could cost billions of dollars without producing sufficient energy savings to justify the spending.

The energy crisis

N.H. town to vote on Onassis refinery

DURHAM, N.H. (AP) — The citizens of this college town were to take their first vote yesterday night on whether they want Aristotle Onassis to build a $60 million oil refinery in their community.

Olympic Refineries, Inc., owned by Onassis, has proposed that the huge facility be constructed on 1,200 acres of land near Great Bay, a tidal estuary off Durham Point. Olympic also would build an offshore terminal for supertankers at the Isles of Shoals about 15 miles from Durham.

The company has taken options on about 3,500 acres for the project and is reportedly willing to spend as much as million to convince the people of New Hampshire-that the refinery should be built.

In two meetings in Durham last week, Olympic officials encountered strong opposition from Durham and seacoast residents.

A nonbinding referendum was to be conducted at the Wednesday night meeting to get some official indication of how Durham voters feel.

Gov. Meldrim Thomson, who has officially backed the refinery proposal, called on citizens across the state to support the refinery plan at their annual town meetings this week.

Results from Wednesday's meetings indicated that citizens want the refinery but that they believe Durham residents should have the final say if it is located here.

The town of Rye, which owns some of the islands where Onassis wants to build the superport, soundly defeated the governor's proposal and passed zoning regulations that would prohibit its construction.

The legislature was expected to take up an ammended bill this week that would give the state control of site selection and the power to override local opposition.

Nixon denies payoff approval

adding that both energy and food prices will drop later this year to fulfill his assertion that "there will not be a recession in 1974." At his news conference last week, Nixon had downgraded the energy situation from crisis to severe problem.

—Commended the Senate for upholding his veto of emergency legislation containing an oil price rollback provision. He said the Senate action vetoed longer lines at gasoline stations and vetoed the rationing of gas.

—Said dire predictions of Republican defeats in the 1974 congressional elections will prove to be wrong. Nixon said special congressional elections are no indicator of what is to come. Republicans have lost three out of four special house elections.

—Said U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East will influence the Arab oil producers to end their embargo against the United States, but declined to forecast what will happen when oil ministers meet next week. "Indicating what they might do might lead them to do otherwise," he said.

—Restated his opposition to public financing of presidential campaigns, saying they "should be financed by the candidates and not the taxpayers." He said one part of his campaign reform package would be an attempt to give candidates a way to defend themselves against unfair criticism by their opponents or the press.

In his discussion of the indictment of Haldeman, Nixon said other persons might reach a different conclusion in reading a transcript or listening to a tape recording of the White House conversation last March 21.

Alleged murderer stabs jail visiter

BILLERICA, Mass.(AP) - Anthony Jackson, being held in the Middlesex County House of Correction on murder charges in connection with the deaths of three Boston area women, was charged yesterday with assaulting a woman who came to visit him at the jail.

The Middlesex County District Attorney's Office said Jackson will be taken before a grand jury "as soon as possible" on charges of assault with intent to murder and assault and battery by means of a dangerous weapon stemming from the stabbing of Michelle Maupin.

The Maupin woman, of Boston's Roxbury section, was treated at St. John's Hospital in Lowell for flesh wounds to the shoulder.

Jackson, 34, of Boston, was returned to his cell in the maximum security section.

Officer Paul Tierney of Cambridge, who was on duty in the visiting room yesterday said Jackson appeared to be striking the woman. When the officer attempted to pull Jackson away, he discovered a wire concealed in the inmate's hand had been used to stab the visitor, Tierney said.

Jackson is awaiting trial on murder charges in the deaths of Ellen Ann Reich, 19, an Emerson College student; Damaris Synge Gillispie, 22, of Boston University, and Ruth Ann Hamilton, 23, a Winthrop art teacher.

Berrigans expecting

WORCESTER, Mass. (AP) - Philip and Elizabeth Berrigan are expecting their first child later this month.

The controversial former Josephit priest made the announcement Wednesday in an interview.

Berrigan and Elizabeth McAlister, a former nun in the Sacred Heart of Mary order, were automatically excommunicated after announcing their marriage last May.

Berrigan said he didn't ask Church permission to marry because he wanted to make his marriage "a challenge to the Church's discipline of celebacy."

"If conscience is to be honored, celebacy should be optional," Berrigan said.

Berrigan is on a campus speaking tour, "advocating non-violent protests and resistance to our value system, consumerism and war."

The Mall: religion The new puritainism

When our Puritan ancestors settled the Northampton-Amherst region in the seventeenth century, the land was a wilderness in a new and alien world. Through their categories of thought and feeling, our ancestors began to transform their wilderness into a workable social order. The formal cornerstone of their social order was that the political, economic, and social components of their daily life were intrinsically tied to and were rightly controlled by their religious world view. This formal cornerstone of their social order was faithfully applied to their daily living and the meetinghouse was the concrete symbol of its success.

In November of 1973 the Puritan life-process remains only a venerated memory in the Northampton-Amherst region, as time and history have brought a new social order to the land. In appearance this new social order is strikingly different from that of our Puritan ancestors. Highways, motor vehicles, large complex buildings, and flying machines now set the atmosphere that farms, horses, and carts once controlled. Yet this new social order exists, like the Puritan social order, through the categories of thought and feeling that determine the behavior of the persons who live in the region.

The formal cornerstone of the modern American social order is that the political, economic, and social components of daily life are inherently disconnected and that religion properly has a separate and peripheral existence. Thus today's formal social cornerstone is the antithesis of the one our Puritan ancestor's adhered to. Yet, is this also true when it comes to its application tc daily life? The fact is that on application, the formal cornerstone of the modern American social order creates the same type of unified daily life process that the Puritan formal cornerstone did!

The reason for this paradox can be found in the American way of life itself. The American way of life has become a religion and its power over the thought and feeling of modern Americans is as strong subconsciously as the Calvinist thrology was strongly consciously over our Puritan ancestors. Our venture into Southeast Asia, our commitment to the conquest of our solar system, and our dependence on technology for the running of our daily life are behavior patterns that are more strongly statements of faith and belief, than of sound rational judgment.

The best example in the Northampton-Amherst region of this paradox is the Mt. Farms Mall. The Mt. Farms Mall was first an idea that required political, economic, and social translation before it became the concrete reality that it now is. Yet these three components of American daily life were not separated from the religion of the American way of life. Instead they were inexorably bound to this religion, of which a concrete manifestation is the Mt. Farms Mall.

The Mt. Farms Mall is a symbol of the authentic cornerstone of modern American life. Covering a massive area of land with man-made materials which provides for a large number of different stores, most of which are under the same roof, the Mt. Farms Mall is an impressive statement of modern America's ability to impose large-scale order in a very short span of time. The statement becomes more impressive as one views the large flow of machines and persons that takes place every day at the mall. Even more impressive is how the vast complexity of goods, services, helpers, and managers are effectively regulated with the flow of customers and shipments, so that order, instead of chaos reigns. With the design of the signs and interior decoration of the mall and the stores, the Mt. Farms Mall aquires a distinctive identity of its own.

When our Puritan ancestors walked up the stairs leading to their meetinghouse, entered, and were seated down; they consciously experienced deep religious feeling which was intensified by the service that followed. Today when a person drives into the Mt. Farms Mall, parks his car, and begins the walk to the mall; he experiences religious feeling which is intensified when he walks through the mall. The difference between this persons' religious experience and his Puritan ancestors' religious experience is that his is subconscious while his ancestors was conscious. Thus unfamiliar persons are caught up in a religious experience that is a part of their daily life which binds them together without their ever being aware of what is taking place.

The Mt. Farms Mall is then a place of religious worship, a modern meetinghouse, which symbolizes the power of religion over the daily life of the persons who use it. Unlike our Puritan ancestors, the formal cornerstone of our social order is not the same cornerstone we put into practice. Thus on the conscious level we believe the Mt. Farms Mall to be another result of economic and practical motivation, while on the subconscious level we experience it as another statement of the power of religious thought and feeling over our daily life.

Sign petition to paralyze nuke grip

To the Editor:

The Coalition for Environmental Quality would like to join MASSPIRG, the Hampshire-Franklin Committee, and all other groups who feel that Mr. Lovejoy's act of collapsing the Montague weather tower was irresponsible. It was also jeapordizing to the movement which is now forming in this area to constructively paralyze the nuclear grip, not only in Montague, but in this state as a whole. In addition, we would like to ask all those who are truly concerned about this critical issue to come and sign our local and national petitions! (Our office is located in room 426D S.U.) We will be having an alert table on March 7th and 14th and hope to collect as many signatures against the Montague plant as possible.

On March 21st, Ralph Nader will be going to the Massachusetts Legislatures to speak in favor of a virtual Mass. Moratorium on nuclear energy. Thousands of our names could carry a good deal of weight! Please help us in this honest cause to fight a harmful source of energy.

New ideas will make better 1st year

To the Editor:

During intersession a group of concerned students, faculty and staff members got together for a two week workshop. The conference, entitled Toward Collaboration was funded through H.E.W. and was coordinated and sponsored by the Resource Newwork. As a result of this workshop several task groups were formed. One of the groups has been meeting regularly for the past month and is concerned with the First Year Experience. This committee is composed of interested students, faculty, and staff members. Our goal is to help make the first year experience significant and meaningful rather than oppressive and alienating.

The first year planning group has separated itself into three task forces. The first group is concerned with freshperson orientation in the fall for the Southwest residential area. The committee is headed by Rob Gilbert and he will be meeting with a planning group on Monday, March 11 at 10:00 a.m. in the Resource Center in Southwest to discuss orientation and how to make it more effective.

The second group is interested in summer orientation and counseling. Rich St. George is forming a team of people who want to look into the ways in which we can present Southwest to First Year students in a more dynamic and informative manner. He can be contacted at 6-4555.

Joe Battista is heading the third group which is focusing on the long range picture. This group is concerned with the educational experience first year students will go through. There will be a meeting of this committee on Thursday, March 7 at 4:00 p.m. in the Resource Center.

We are anxious to get yourinput early so that we may make some significant changes for next year. People are needed to help with the various committees and all ideas and suggestions are welcomed. The needs of the UMass community can be met if people are willing to help each other.

Please call the Resource Center in Hampden Dining Commons at 5-2416 and speak to Ronald Goldman if you want any further information.

McGilvray stirs the apathetic UMies

To the Editor,

Being a UMie of good standing (i.e. I paid my tuition), I'm taking a chance of ruining my future at UMass by writing this letter and getting involved in an issue and not remaining apathetic.

In the past week I've noticed a slight amount of flak over Mr. McGilvray's cartoon of last Friday, 22 February.

I've attended Massachusetts' official asylum of higher learning at Amherst for three semesters and have been enjoying(?) the Collegian since 1972.

I feel that while I have been following his character exploits, Mr. McGilvary has shown an unbelievable and enjoyable insight into the life of many a Umie.

I don't claim to know why Mr. McGilvary has depicted certain characters as he has but I think the level of his humor is above the simple and straight forward. Maybe it is just me, but in his UMIES series Mr. McGilvary has been able to penetrate many facades and show the humor in us all and our actions.

Keep up the good work, Don, and as for your cartoon, change only your underware.

Late check receivers need vets club

To the Editor:

This letter is addressed to all veterans who are concerned about their financial situations here at UMass. I don't know how you feel about it, but I find that my finances are getting a little bit tight at the end of every month. This is especially so when a check is a week or more late in arriving. The Vets' Office in Wittless Hall tries to do everything they can for us, but there's only so much they can do. One thing they can't do is lobby to get us more money. The V.F.W. and American Legion do most, if not all of the veterans' lobbying in Washington, but they aren't about to help the younger vets, because they don't have many younger members. So we get screwed out of money which we earned, simply because we aren't into their trip. Consequently, we're going to have to do our own lobbying. Although the educational benefits have gone up since our fathers were getting them, the real costs of an education have gone up much more. Result, we're not gettng as much in real dollars.

There is a solution, however. The UMass Veteran's Club, which is not a social club, intends to represent the younger veterans when lobbying for, or against, legislation that we feel is important. In order to push effectively, we need a lot of people helping us, and this means you. There are 2400 vets on this campus right now, and if we band together we could conceivably become the biggest and, subsequently, the most powerful special interest group on the campus. If we could organize statewide, with community colleges, state colleges, even UMass Boston, we could have a large block of votes, and our lobbyists could have a lot of influence.

I, therefore, urge all veterans who feel that they're getting a raw deal from the beaurocracies of government and university, to attend the next meeting of tte UMass Veteran's Club this Thursday, March 7, 1974 in the Campus Center.

In the meantime, we will have a table set up on the concourse of the Campus Center for most of the week. Come by and rap with other concerned vets about what bothers you most. Find out what the club can do for you, how it can do it, aad how much more it can do if we all push together.

Collegian can't howl freedom

To the Editor,

What surfaced with the publishing of Don McGilvray's caricature of the Chancellor has been building at least since the beginning of the school year.

Throughout the year the Collegian has printed sexist articles and cartoons. The close relationship between sexism and racism is obvious to all but the Collegian editors.

The week before the cartoon appeared a fight took place in the Blue Wall. It was reported simply as a brawl. The next day in a letter to the editor, it came out that this fight had started with racial insults aimed at two Afro-American women. Given that the original article might have been put together from hearsay, or learning that what actually happened involved racism and sexism I would think that any press would attempt to correct the error. A responsible press would attempt to bring the issues to light, yet no attempt was made by anybody let alone the Collegian to contact the women and men involved nor even to correct the mistaken reporting. In not doing so the Collegian did the college community a disservice. It is not news that racism exists in America nor that it exists on this campus. It is important that all of us recognize our racism and sexism, a responsible press would have investigated and brought out the issues. The Collegian's failure to report this in an adequate and fair manner illuminates the fact that Afro-Americans are conspicuously unrepresented on the staff of their university paper, and suggests that there are other areas in which the Collegian is negligent with the possible exception of streaking.

The Collegian . can't howl about freedom of the press if it refuses to take the responsibility that goes with it.

UMass is fun

I'm Marty

Hi. I'm Marty — Marty Moronsky that is. I'm a Freshman — at least, I used to be. But now, I feel like I've been here for years. I mean, it's only been six months, but it seems like so fuckin' long.

Not that I haven't learned anything. I mean, man, I know more dope about more dope than anybody around. Why, since I came here from Marlboro, I've tried just about everything I can think of. One time, I was doing sopors and I fell out the window. It's lucky as shit that I live on the basement. I could've gotten in alot of trouble. You can get in trouble for just about anything at UMass.

Anyhow, I can't really complain too much about UMass. My car's only been towed five times, and I've only been ripped off twice. And for Southwest, that's a pretty good record.

So this is where I stand. The only thing I'm sure about around here is that I'm not sure about anything. I'm not even sure what I'm doing here. I started off as a pre-med major, but I flunked chemistry. So I switched to psychology, but the computer knocked me out of all my courses. So here I am with a shitty course in rhetoric, two history courses, food science, and a course in home economics, and I have no idea what my major is.

Besides, most of my courses just put me to sleep. Except food science - that's funny. They even throw in some sex education for the hell of it. I guess it all depends on what you've been eating.

Right now I've been waiting for a check from my mother, so I can buy some cocaine. It's supposed to be really good stuff, and Sharon wants to do some with me. So who am I to argue?

It seems like the new fad around here is "streaking". It doesn't really make sense to me. I mean, why would anybody want to freeze their asses off, running around Southwest. It's cold enough around here, as it is. I wonder if "streaking" is anything like "skinny dipping".

My roommate, Carl, writes for the Collegian. He says it's a pretty shitty paper. I don't know — I only look at the funnies and the horoscope. I used to do the crossword puzzles, but they always use the same words. I told Carl I thought they should have other games in the Collegian. He said they do, but nobody knows about them.

It's getting near suppertime. Not that it matters — it's only the Dining Commons. It seems like everybody is always complaining about the Dining Commons, but they eat there anyway. I'd just prefer not to think about it at all. Besides, everyone at UMass knows that if you don't think about something, it just goes away.

So I'll just sit around and get high and listen to the Grateful Dead. Sometimes I wonder if it's all worthwhile, but it's easier not to think about it. Besides, UMass is so much fun.

Judgement needs integrity

"Judge, and be prepared to be judged."

Very often, when one makes a moral evaluation, one is confronted by those who assert that nobody has a right to stand in judgement of others. Adhering to the religious view of man's inherent imperfectability, they insist that since no one is perfect, no one is in a position to pronounce a moral judgement. "Judge not, that ye may be judged," remains the watchword for moral abdication.

But moral neutrality is a blank check, to be played for all it is worth by those whose intentions are to ravage the stammering multitudes. The barbarism of the Twentieth Century has been encouraged by those who resign themselves to the belief that "one man's barbarian is another man's savior." Unfortunately, the countless victims of totalitarian savagery were never given the opportunity to express their moral evaluation of their fate. I sincerely doubt that they would have been neutral about moral issues.

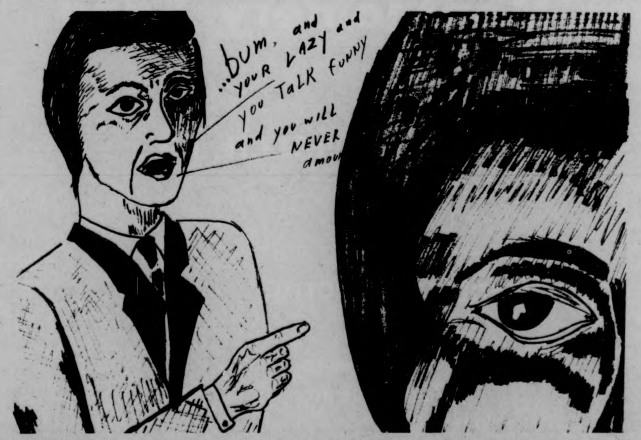
The existence of unmitigated evil necessitates that we speak out with righteous indignation. To do so does not mean that we are being blind or dogmatic...or hypocritical. One does not have to be infallible in order to denounce evil. The only precondition that a judgement requires is integrity. Obviously, one who denounces repression in Chile but applauds it in Cuba (or vice versa) has no business standing in judgement. Unfortunately, those who posture as opponents of one particular brand of tyranny are often apologists for another brand.

Can anyone stand as judge who has not attained "perfection?" Omniscience is not attainable to man, because the human species is limited biologically. But in the moral realm, an individual may strive toward a goal of perfection by not willfully breaching his or her integrity. We can properly evaluate and judge if we can honestly say that we have never consciously violated the standards by which we judge others.

We may choose to express a moral evaluation to a number of other individuals, hoping to persuade others toward our point of view. An example of such appeals is the current publicity accorded to Alexander Solzhenitsyn. Many people in the West are hoping to mobilize enough sentiment on behalf of Solzhenitsyn and his admirers in the Russian liberal community in order to prevail upon the Soviet rulers to discontinue their persecution of dissenters. But what is the status of dissent within our own business scrutinizing Soviet repression when our system is so "repressive."

A person of integrity will realize that there is a world of difference between the planned execution of hundreds of thousands of "suspected counter revolutionaries" during the lifetime of the present Soviet leaders, and difficulties experienced by dissenters in America. That same sense of integrity would compel us to make those differences more distenguishable...by practicing what we preach.

We can begin our preparations for our own judgement by cleaning up our own house, so that there will be no mistake about the seriousness of the standards we set. We must seek the elimination of all repressive legacies in America: military conscription and the imprisonment of those who evade, racism, legal double standards, enforced conformity to certain lifestyles, etc. But while we are cleaning up, we must not forget that we have the right to talk about the dirt in our house without being stripped of our right to live in our house.



...bum, and your LAZY and you TaLK funny and you will NEVER amou

The Third World i The Third World will not take this backwoods mentality any longer.

Pure waste

By WHITNEY CRANSHAW

Increasing recognition of the finite nature of the Earth's mineral and energy resources has focused attention on the need to reduce waste. For the most part people seem to be pursuing this in the form of direct fuel savings by lowering thermostats and driving less. Rarely considered, but also of importance is the energy involved in the production of consumer goods. New energy-intensive materials such as plastics and aluminum have moved into every field of production and are probably most regularly encountered in packaging. The result has been a great increase in energy demands and the problems of solid waste disposal.

Rather symbolic of this energy intensive pure waste in packaging is the fate of the returnable bottle. There was a time, perhaps vaguely remembered when returning bottles was a routine part of visits to the store. These bottles were then reused 30-40-50 or more times-an ideal form of recycling.

This was before glass and can manufacturers realized the potential market. They could change bottling practices and substitute throwaways for multiple-use bottles. Spurred by the huge profits possible they undertook to sell their pure waste product through slick promotion, questionable pressure on bottlers, and a downplaying the indirect costs involved in a throwaway container system. Corporate profits zoomed to the point where beverage cans are 45 per cent of the can industry's market and throwaway beverage bottles are roughly 30 percent of the sales by glass manufacturers. Unfortunately, the success of the irresponsible promotion has been paid for by a variety of public subsidies:

-Environmental deterioration produced by litter which has been so aggravated by the change that the discarded beer can is often used as a symbol of the callousness of American attitudes towards the environment.

-Increased consumption of electricity (at 500 watts per can;. Enough energy is being used to produce throwaways each year to provide for the energy needs of a residential area of 7½ million people

-An extra load of the sorely taxed solid waste disposal system produced by enough unnecessary bottles and cans to yearly form 17 stacks to the Moon. Higher product cost produced by charging consumers for the container (about 4-5 cents) instead of reusing it and spreading out the costs.

-A decrease in employment in the beer and soft drink industries produced by a system that favors automation and national concerns over locals.

Currently before the Natural Resources Committee of the Massachusetts legislature is H 4122, a bill which seeks to set a minimum refund value on all beer and soft drink containers as a means to encourage the multi-use returnable containers and to reduce litter. It is patterned after a bill that has been very successfully operating in Oregon for the past year and a half. Strong industry lobbying in the past has tied up similar bills, but a more favorable committee assignment and the successful results of similar laws in various towns, counties, and states around the country has helped increase its chances of passage. The bill deserves support. Throwaway containers cost too much both in market and in social and environmental cost to be continued for their dubious convenience value. By writing state representatives, senators and the Natural Resources Committee you can help begin to effect a more rational approach to the use of Our Earth's resources.

Letters Policy

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes all letters to the editor. They must be signed, and include the author's address and phone number. Also, all letters must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces per line, and no more than two pages.

Organizations may submit letters, but they must include a name and phone number for reference purposes.

All letters are subject to editing, for either content or space, according to the judgement of the editors. Due to space limitations, there is no guarantee that all letters received will be printed.

It's clear who I represent

To the Editor:

As stated in my previous letter to the Collegian I simply desire that all of the rhetoric consuming the Board of Governors, Program Council and graduate and undergraduate fees be accurate. Noel Conley still persists in binding the facts to fit his own desires and misconceptions. As stated previously in my letter, Noel, I would urge you to talk to Paul Hamel, Treasurer of the Undergraduate Government Association, and David Booker, Speaker of the Undergraduate Senate. Perhaps, they can present you with the factual information you need to clarify your letters to the "Collegian" and the misconceptions you seem to be operating under.

Larry St. Cyr, Jr. appears to be keeping alive the Nixonian philosophy of attacking the character of the person you disagree with. The answers to the questions you posed in your letter to the Collegian are a matter of public record. No attempt was made on my part to hide those facts. Yes, it is true that I am not particularly fond of Noel Conley, but not for the reasons you suspect. I am displeased with his performance on the Board and have told him so on numerous occassions, not for opposing me, which every member of the Board has done at one time or another, but for failing to justify his actions with the proper information. As for who I represent -- rather than answer that myself, I would prefer that any UMie who is interested simply look at my record and ask around the community. I believe that it will become abundantly clear as to whom I represent -- student interests.

Change target, please

To the Editor:

We would like to request the mighty snowball marksman housed in the vicinity of the Tao Epsilon Phi house refrain from making passing motor vehicles their target. On Wednesday evening, February 12th while we were driving towards Amherst, a snowball suddenly hit our windshield. Our seven year old daughter hit the dash board when the brakes were slammed on, stopping the car. When we got out of the car snowballs were aimed directly at us. Stephanie was not hit by a snowball because she ducked. The people throwing the snowballs ran into Tao Epsilon Phi. We filed a complaint with the police department and a kind officer visited the Tao Epsilon Phi house with us. However, in a group meeting at Tao Epsilon Phi, nobody was involved in snowballing us. So, as parents we were left to explain to our child, who was wearing her Brownie uniform 1) why "Grownups" were trying to hurt her in the dark; 2) why some people thought it was funny to frighten children; 3) why "Grownups" were laughing at her when she was scared, and 4) why nobody could be found who admitted to throwing snowballs at her.

We have attended this University for three years and have never had an experience like this. So, the next time someone is looking for some kicks, please stop and consider the fact that many students are parents with small children. Unfortunately, our child just doesn't understand why someone would deliberately attempt to injure another person. Must she learn fear at this University, at age seven?

Do you think steaks grow on trees?

To the Editor:

I just finished reading Cataldo's commentary on gun control. He definitely had his points in condemning the legality of handguns. But he went a bit far in downgrading the entire sport of hunting. He feels hunters are cowards because they "hide behind trees" and shoot deer. He wonders if hunters would shoot deer if they had rifles also. By that little gem of reasoning, Mr. Cataldo should be grateful that the cows, chickens, pigs, and other animals that are prepackaged for him don't cut his head off! "Civilized" people don't realize that the sporting chance the hunter gives his game far outweighs the breed 'em, feed 'em, slaughter 'em methods of commercial meat conglomerates. Yet, no outcry is heard for the three month old lamb whose feet are delicacies to some. Or, Mr. Cataldo, did you think steaks grew on trees?

I pay $13.50 for a combination fishing and hunting license, which goes much further towards preventing the "destruction of wildlife" than any idealistic rap against hunting can do. It is not anti-hunting articles which preserve marshlands, upland game preserves, and other covers for wildlife. It's the hard buck paid by sportsmen thru taxes on ammo and guns, license fees, and duck stamps, that helps wildlife in general, through hard winters. Since "civilized" man has taken over the land, there are no natural predators to hold deer herds, and other animal populations, in check. Hunting, the skilled pursuit of game, has a sound ecological basis. It prevents overpopulation, starvation, and ruined gene pools of many species of wildlife. Or, Mr. Cataldo, would you prefer that we catch them, slaughter them, and can them? Would it then be okay to "destroy wildlife"? Or, shall we just let them reproduce themselves to the point of famine?

I am not a fanatic NRA member. On the contrary, I believe handguns of all types, (not just those with barrel lengths of under five inches), should be outlawed. There exists too much temptation for the inexperienced or mentally deficeint to take the power of life into his hands. Shotguns and rifles, however, do not pose as much of a threat to public safety. Adequate legislation would also prevent most of the unstable from acquiring long-guns.

To me, there is nothing more exciting than watching my springer spaniel digging through the frosty turf, on a late autumn morning, looking for that cock pheasant she smells so clearly. When she does find it, raises it for the shot, and makes the retrieve, I find all the class, style, and excitement rooted in this ancient sport.

No, Mr. Cataldo, I am not destroying wildlife, and I resent your inflammatory remarks on the states of hunters' "brave souls." At the end of his commentary, Cataldo seems so concerned with proving his own bravery by saying he has seen a gun from both ends. Bravo!! But, Mr. Hero, bravery is not dictated by the views man holds on how he should make people live their lives, only in how he lives his own.

The law and you

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND
Attorney for Students

One of the games law school students play might be described as the "Exploding Question" or "What If...then..." Those of you who see the movie "Paper Chase" will see it being played, but may not understand it.

The rules are based upon the idea of Socratic method (for every answer there is another question). The smart guy (usually someone with whom you share irreconcialable ennity) starts by stating a fundamental proposition with which everyone can readily agree. Then the same person offers a variation (acting as if the answer were simple) which does not conform to the original proposition. As the game develops the variations expand through limitless permutations with very little goal save ego gratification.

To illustrate, let me suggest the following fundamental propositions:

1. The First Amendment protects the rights of speech and assembly, among others, partly on the notion that truth will be the ultimate product of the rule.
2. Truth is good.
3. Truth is a natural and observable fact.
4. Truth cannot harm because by its very nature, truth is harmless and non-truth is harmful.

If the foregoing can be accepted without a reat deal of debate, let me suggest another set of fundamental truths:

1. Everybody has a body. (That's easy enough).
2. Everybody may be assumed to have a reasonably accurate if subliminal, knowledge about the shape and size and organization of their own body. This may be limited to natural and observable facts about it and may not extend to an appropriate cerebral appreciation or understanding.
3. People being what they are, are made more or less uniform as to size, shape and organization. The perceptual variations are far more mental and visual than measurable and are really quite subtle. I suspect that most people don't really believe that, but it won't matter here.
4. The unclothed human form of any age, sex, or size is unabashedly true. It is precisely what it is and it looks precisely what it looks like. It is not the subject of any false rendering. It does not promise what it can't deliver.
5. As a form, humans find human forms attractive. Sometimes some humans find particular forms more attractive than others, but on the spectrum of things, human bodies can be marked fairly high on the better side of life.

I hope that digestion of the two sets of my selected fundamentals is complete and that there is no serious disagreement yet. (You may have to be a bit honest with yourself).

I contend that the undraped, denuded, bare, unrendered, unpainted human body is truth. Therefore it follows that the human is harmless by itself. The mere fact of such body is a threat to no one. My view does not change whether the body is in motion, or stationary, verticle or horizontal or in any other particular attitude.

It is my own philosophical view that given nudity as truth about which curiosity is natural, it is nevertheless more hamrful to establish the clothed form as it were truth than the contrary. I refuse to accept the notion that nudity of members of either sex has any adverse effect upon other members of the community regardless of age or sex with the exception of those whose cultural background has kept them from the truth of which I now am speaking.

The same rationale is applicable to such non-threatening objects as automobiles, airplanes or (I wish it wasn't so obvious) guns. By themselves these objects are relatively innocuous. It is fear of whaT- they might do or in any particular instance specific fear of what they are being used to do that prompts the law to intervene.

The same reasoning should apply to streaking in my view. Nothing intrisically harmful is likely to result from buff behinds batting in the breeze or free fronts frolicking in the flesh. I agree with Security Director David Johnston as far as the disinclination of his troops to trap ravelling traipsers. It is gladdening to note the sagacity of Assistant Director Saul Chafin that stranded streakers will be termed disorderly and not indecent. One wonders why motion

WFCR & women

WFCR will commemorate the sixty-third anniversary of International Women's Day Friday by pre-empting all of its regular programming in order to bring its listeners a nineteen-hour panorama of broadcasts devoted to the present and past condition of women throughout the world.

Women in many field will come together to reflect on the role of women and on a variety of themes affecting all lives.

Officially started on March 8th, 1910, in Denmark, the history of International Women's Day goes back to 1857 when women garment-textile workers held a mass demonstration in New York City for better working conditions and equality of work opportunities for women. As the women's movement progresses today, these same issues are alive. These and other concerns will be discussed March 8 on WFCR, at 88.5 FM.

Throughout the day, there will be profiles of many women influential in past and contemporary times whose lives have made a difference in the way we view things today. Among them: Ella Baker, founder of SNCC; Maya Deren, filmmaker; Carmen Pereira of Guinea-Bissau; Kaethe Kollwitz, artist; Severine, 19th century French women's rights advocate; and many others.

Meet a candidate

Attorney Edward F. Harrington, a candidate for the Democratic party's nomination for Attorney General will meet with members of University community at room 162 of the Campus Center, Friday at 1:00 p.m.

Harrington served under former Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy as a member of his special prosecutive group against organized crime and labor racketeering, and a member of his select team dispatched to Mississippi in the summer of 1964 to investigate the murders of three civil rights workers.

In announcing his candidacy, Harrington described the position of Attorney General as "The chief attorney for the Commonwealth" whose duties include prosecution of certain criminal matters, rendering advisory opinions to other state agencies, supervision of public charities, investigating and regulating consumer protection, conducting continuous investigation and procescution of organized crime, including trade in narcotics and other dangerous drugs, and representing the Commonwealth in numerous civil cases."

Attorney Harrington will be on campus as a part of a series of candidate hours, sponsored by the University and State Communications Council U.S.C.C., students interested in further information are invited to call 6-4388.

Notes, quotes and anecdotes

Campus Crusade for Christ will be hosting a musical ensemble, The Sing Praise, Friday night at 7:00 p.m. in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union.

The Sing Praise are 8 students who are studying at the Bible Institute in St. Johnsbury, Vermont. They will be singing and sharing the ministry of life in the Lord Jesus Christ. All are welcome. Refreshments will be served.

YSA to present forum

On Thursday, March 7, at 8 p.m. in the Colonial Lounge in the Student Union, The Young Socialist Alliance will present another forum as part of its continuous forum series. Britain's Crisis: Working People vs. the Government will cover all aspects of the recent crisis of British capitalism from a Marxist perspective, along with discussions of the Socialist alternative.

Rising prices, massive inflation, and shortages of nearly all basic necessities are symptoms of a degenerating economic system: not only in England, but around the capitalist world. The United Mine Workers of American have recently revealed that U.S. coal is being diverted to Britain in large quantities, and have declared solidarity with their British comrades and pledged to do all in their power to stop these scab coal shipments.

Speaking for the Socialist alternative is Tom Moriarty, a member of the Socialist Workers Party and a former UMass antiwar activist. All are invited to attend the forum and informal discussion and question period which will follow.

Gay coffeehouse

The Student Homophile League and the Gay Women's Caucus will sponsor a gay coffeehouse this Saturday evening from 8 p.m. at Dickinson main lounge in Orchard Hill. Only the very best in entertainment and refreshments will be provided. The Coffeehouse is open to all members of the gay community and of course, there's no charge.

Psychotherapy

On Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Herter Hall 231, the Department of Psychology and the Council of Undergraduate Students in Psychology will present a program entitled: "Psychotherapy: A Variety of Current Approaches." The program will feature five members of the Psychology Department, who will present their views and approaches to psychotherapy: Dr. Sheldon Cashdan (Interactional Psychotherapy), Dr. Morton Harmatz (Behavior Modification), Dr. Alexandra Kaplan (Focal Therapy), Dr. Alan Lieberman (Interpersonal Therapy), and Dr. Norman Simonson (Role Enactment Therapy).

Sargent and colleague think Ford should replace Nixon

WASHINGTON (AP) - Republican Gov. Francis W. Sargent of Massachusetts and several Democratic colleagues said Wednesday the country would be better off if Gerald R. Ford replaced President Nixon in the White House.

However, two other Republicans, Washington's Daniel J. Evans and Michigan's William G. Milliken, said it is important for the congressional impeachment investigation to proceed so the country can learn the whole story of Nixon's possible involvement in the Watergate scandal.

Their comments came as the National Governors Conference opened a two-day winter meeting amid general dissatisfaction with the way the Nixon administration is handling such problems as energy, the economy and Watergate.

Some of the governors sat around the conference tables, listening to a speech by Vice President Ford about the need to safeguard personal privacy and listening to contradictory statements about the nation's economic prospect .

Chairman Herbert Stein of the Council of Economic Advisers said the administration expects to avoid a recession this year. But economist Arthur Okun, who headed the council under the Democrats, said that "when all the returns are in," we will call 1974 a recession year."

Meanwhile, other governors circulated around the conference hotel and talked to reporters about matters ranging from the Arab oil embargo to Watergate.

Gov. Patrick J. Lucey, D-Wis., renewed his call for Nixon's resignation. In contrast to an icy reception he received at the last meeting in Nevada last June, he now found some support.

"A lot of damage has been done already," Lucey said. "I hate to think of three or four months more in which this thing is dragged out."

Democrats taking a similar position included Govs. Wendell Ford of Kentucky and Jimmy Carter of Georgia.

Asked if Nixon should resign, Gov. Ford said, "Yes sir. It would elminate the concern people have for the office of the presidency."

Carter said Southerners have great respect for the presidential office. "That's why I'm so disgusted with the way Nixon has disgraced it," he said. "I'm for impeachment if there's not a quicker way."

The law and you

somehow makes it better and even more why it makes a difference. The law clearly frowns upon the sport and the University approach seems to be wise management at least.

I do not wish to convey to anyone that streaking is a lawful activity. But, I do think there is much to be said for the constitutional question which, in Vermont at least, was resolved in favor of skinny dipping. (Of course, the fact that a senior law enforcement official of that state was busted for skinny dipping is not suggested as a reason for that result).

Finally, it seems to me that any sport which is on the edge of the law ought to be organized into leagues with specific rules and appropriate standards. (Consider that anyone who did what hockey and lacrosse players do to each other would serve long terms were it not for organization and rules). Messrs. Johnston and Chafin have suggested at least two: 1. the field must be large enough that players can keep moving (at least if a referee shows up) and 2. the audience should limit its appreciation to polite applause, perhaps as for tennis matches.

I do not agree with any contention that laws against streaking are supported by the First Amendment right to redress grievances.

Streaker injured in cycle crash

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Some of the fun of the streaking fad sweeping college campuses was spoiled by the critical injury of a nude motorcyclist yesterday.

A crowd of 300 at the East-Central State College campus in Ada, Okla., watched in horror Tuesday as Mitchell Scruggs, 21, lost control of his bike and slammed into a parked car. He suffered critical head injuries.

Elsewhere in Oklahoma, dashing around in the buff were some Oklahoma State students, who made a successful streak from the school library to a dormitory at high noon. And late Tuesday evening, about 40 streakers entertained an estimated 2,000 persons on the University of Oklahoma campus.

In Sioux Falls, S.D., the streaking fad reached down into the high school set Tuesday night.

A youngster, wearing only a ski mask, socks and white tennis shoes, made a made dash across the basketball court between quarters of the Sioux Falls Lincoln-Brandon Valley high school basketball game.

An estimated 3,000 persons witnessed the sprint, and he was given thunderous applause. But the Sioux Falls Police Department took the youth into custody shortly after the incident.

Students at the University of Pennsylvania admitted their planned April 1 "streak for impeachment" at the White House was all "a giant hoax."

Butz pushes farm exports

WASHINGTON (AP) - The best hope of giving Americans more food for their dollar lies in increased farm exports, Agriculture Secretary Earl L. Butz said yesterday.

Butz appeared with Commerce Secretary Frederick B. Dent and Labor Secretary Peter J. Brennan to urge the Senate Finance Committee to give the Nixon administration board authority to make trade agreements with other nations..

Butz noted it was a record $13 billion of farm exports that put the U.S. trade balance in the black last year. And he predicted a rise to $20 billion this year.

He said the trade reform bill is necessary to take full advantage of this nation's agriculture system, generate economic expansion and reduce the trade deficit by expanding farm exports.

Butz conceded that American farmers now are hard pressed to meet current export demands but said they will plant 40 million acres more this year than they did in 1972.

If increasing numbers of people are to be fed, the world's first objective must be to negotiate for a rational use of agricultural resources, "one in which each country produces what it can produce best because market competition demands it," he said.

"Consumers benefit when export oriented agricultural policies stimulate the general economy, provide jobs off the farm, and reduce tax costs, Butz said.

Dent said the U.S. balance of trade is expected to shift back to a deficit this year because of the energy shortage, and called the trade bill a tool for obtaining greater market access for American products and services.

Governors ask suspension of matching state highway funds

WASHINGTON (AP) - The chairman of the National Governors Conference called on the Nixon administration today to suspend temporarily the requirement that states match federal highway funds in order to avert "a further depressing effect" on their economies.

Republican Gov. Daniel J. Evans of Washington made the request as a study showed the fuel crisis might cost states up to $2 billion in gas tax revenues this year plus additional losses in other revenue.

Robert E. Merriam, chairman of the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations, said in releasing the figures that "in less than two months, the general fiscal situation of state governments has changed from optimism to great uncertainty."

Evans, appearing with Merriam at a news conference as the nation's governors opened their mid-winter meeting, declared that lifting of the Arab oil embargo would reduce threatened state revenue losses only slightly.

Katahdin survivor suffers amputation

ORONO, Maine (AP) - A member of the ill-fated winter climb on Mt. Katahdin has had part of both feet amputated, one of his campanions said today.

Robert Proudman, 25, of Gorham, N.H., told an inquiry here that Paul DeBello lost parts of both feet as a result of the climb which resulted in the death of Tom Keddy.

DeBello, 23, of Jackson,N.H. was the last person to see Keddy alive.

Proudman, one of the leaders of the six-man climbing party, said the group "made no big mistake, but may have made a series of small mistakes in judgement before we made the climb."

The inquiry is being conducted by the Baxter State Park Authority in an effort to evaluate the search and rescue mission and to take steps to prevent similar tragedy in the future.

Speaking for the group, Proudman said they misjudged the seriousness and size of the stormfront which stranded them on the mile-high mountain located in the southern end of the park.

The group started climbing in spring-like weather, but were caught by rain, fog, snow and a 60-degree drop in temperature.

Dear Aggie...

By LAFILLE SANSMARBRES
MDC Staff

(Do you have an academic, social or personal problem? Tell it to Aggie, The Collegian's exclusive columnist. Send or bring letters to The Collegian, Student Union Building, UMass, Amherst, 01002 -- editor)

Dear Aggie,

I have a friend who has a crush on a friend of mine. The problem is, I have a crush on him too. What I want to know is if I tell him that my friend has a crush on him, would he avoid her and spend more time with me because we are "good friends" I don't know how he feels about - or her. But he's always friendly and makes an effort to come to visit us both. But then again, he visits a lot of girls. Should I let him know how I feel, and if so, how?

End of Rope

Dear End,

I can only tell you what anybody else would. Go in there and be obnoxious! Let your feelings be known. Go out of your way to bump into him, by meeting him for lunch - accidentally, of course. Why care about your girlfriend? All's fair in love and war, right? If he doesn't take to you then, forget it. No man is worth that much aggravation.

Dear Aggie,

My boyfriend complains that my mustache is unfeminine. He's been after me for the past few months to have it professionally removed. I feel that women should be allowed to grow hair, and that societal modes are outdated. I love my boyfriend and want to keep him. What should I do?

Delilah

Dear Delilah,

What do you want to do? Electrolysis is sometimes painful and costly, and not always effective, although in most cases it has worked very well. If removing it is too harsh a move for you, compromise. Why not dye it? That way you can keep the hair but it won't be so unsightly. If it's the principal of the thing, then keep a stiff upper hairy lip and combat the looks you get plus the comments from your boyfriend. Whatever the case, let me know. If you lose your boyfriend, I'm sure I'll be hearing from you anyway.

Dear Aggie,

I have this problem with my girlfriend. Not her, really. Actually, it's her mustache. You see, it's heavier than mine! I've been trying to grow one for two years now and I still get embarrassing comments. I've asked her to have it professionally removed and she's refused. She must know how resentful I am because all she does is gloat. And to make things worse, every time I go to kiss her on the lips, she always moves her head down just a little so I end up kissing her idiot mustache! It's degrading. What'll I do?

American Hairless

Dear Hairless,

Cheer up. It can't be all that bad, although for some reason this problem seems awfully familiar to me. Is your girlfriend's name Delihah by any chance? In any case, try appealing to her emotions. Tell her how you feel and see what she says. If she loves you, shell do something about. It she's still adamant, this just may be another The Way We Were story - although, politics, I can see maybe, but a mustache...?

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

By SYDNEY OMARR

Jockeys born under Taurus do their best riding on grass or off-track conditions, such as mud. For a steady ride, choose the jockey born under this zodiacal sign. The big horse, the large animal who must be made to understand who is boss, is made to order for this rider. Taurus jockeys bring more horses in the money during the month of September.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Do more analyzing than confronting--your position needs reinforcement. Persons who are supposed to perform basic services might let down on the job. Know it and don't commit yourself. Wait, listen and observe.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Avoid acting on impulse. Count "Ten" before making response to accusation. The more calm, deliberate you are, the better for you. Know it and act like you are aware of it. Smooth-talking individual may be trying to trap you, using flattery as a weapon. Be wary!

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Much that occurs could be clouded by wishful thinking. It may not be easy, but it is necessary now to be factual. Otherwise, you will be embarrassed. Applies especially to relationships with opposite sex.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Hold off on journeys. Overcome temtation to bicker with neighbors, relatives. Many around you now appear stubborn, heavy-handed. Ride with the tide. Conditions, as they exist, are but temporary. You actually are due for good financial news.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Some desires are fulfilled only after they are revised. A more realistic approach is necessary. Don't hang on to losing proposition. Let go of past. Prepare for future. Aries, Libra persons could figure prominently.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Cycle is high but nothing is handed you on proverbial silver platter. Take initiative. Make your own luck. Blustering associate tests your mettle. Eliminate safety hazard at place of residence. Take no unnecessary chances.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Go slow despite urgings of one who has head in clouds. Heed inner voice. Follow through on hunch--but keep logic right up front. Aquarian figures in important way. Double-check behind the scenes. Separate fact from illusion.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Friends may quarrel. Keep sense of humor. Highlight versatility. Give full play to intellectual curiosity. Deal with Sagittarius, Gemini persons. Don't promise more than you can deliver. Study Libra message.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Surprise is due and it comes from one who usually keeps distance. Procedures are due to be revised. Be ready to assume more responsibility. Contract, partnership, joint efforts are activated. Check location of legal documents.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Be aware of fine points, apparently minor details. Associate who is supposed to perform certain tasks may be negligent. Know it and ask questions. Obtain answers, not evasions. Be thorough. Ignore one who talks fast but has little to back assertions.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Money and emotions make powerful mixture. Nothing happens to you halfway--now it is all or nothing. Some persons close to you begin to express unusual opinions. Instead of being upset, try to learn. You might be delighted with ultimate results.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Be selective. Choose quality. Turn down secondhand products. You have right to the best--show it and know it and make others realize it, too. Decision time is due regarding marriage, partnership, joint effort. Let others have their say before committing yourself.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are capable of creating illusions, of being poetic, of sensing what others need and think and desire. April will be a most significant month for you this year. Persons born under Pisces and Virgo seem to be drawn to you. You are selective, at times autocratic but nearly always for the underdog. You are introspective and loyal; you also are easily hurt and often see persons only as you wish they could be.

Sargent asks Congress to fund aid to handicapped children

WASHINGTON (AP) - Massachusetts Governor Francis W. Sargent yesterday asked Congress to help end the "legacy of neglect" for the nation's estimated seven million handicapped children.

Appearing before the House Select subcommittee on Education, Sargent testified in support of a bill by Rep. John Brademas, D-Ind., which declares that 60 per cent of handicapped children receive "no special educational services at all."

The bill would require the federal government to meet up to 75 per cent of the additional cost of educating the handicapped.

The government currently contributes about 7 per cent to state and local programs for the handicapped, according to Dr. Daniel Ringelheim, chairman of the National Advisory Committee on the Handicapped.

Ewald B. Nyquist, Commisioner of Education for the state of New York, told the sub-committee that the cost of educating handicapped children is "anywhere from two to five times the cost of educating 'normal' children."

Dr. Ringelheim, who also serves as New Jersey's Director of Special Education, compared the plight of the handicapped child to a normal fifth grade child who was suddenly told there would be no fifth grade classes next year.

In Massachusetts, Sargent said, 50,000 children suffering from some sort of physical or mental retardation are in classrooms with no special services. Another 3,000 "reside in large, impersonal state institutions, stagnating for lack of care," he said.

"And beyond these, thousands more are simply waiting at home, untouched by any social or educational service," he added.

Anti-Defamation League charges 'hostility' to Jews in media

NEW YORK (AP) — The Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith has released a report asserting that "hostility and insensitivity to Jews and Jewish concerns" have been "displayed by 'respectable' elements in the American media, clergy and government."

The report, released Tuesday, is the result of a 3½ year study by League officials. It cited the following as examples of "hostility and insensitivity:"

—Rowland Evans and Robert Novak whose syndicated columns "frequently echoed the main themes of pro-Arab propaganda."

—An address before the Association of Arab University Graduates by the Rev. Daniel J. Berrigan, who "castigated Israel in New Left terms,"

—The Christian Science Monitor, an international newspaper, which "swallowed whole the Arabs' propaganda claim that they were merely attempting to reclaim Arab territories,"

—Sen. J. W. Fulbright, D-Ark., chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, whom the report says made a "false charge that the Israelis control Mideast policy in the Congress contrary to our interests."

—The American Friends Service Committee, a Quaker group, which the report says published a study on the Middle East which "repressed facts and distorted history to reach a slanted and one-sided set of conclusions."

Though much of the report's criticisms relate to American stances on the Middle East considered to be hostile to Israel and American Jewry, it also deals with other, broader instances of alleged anti-Semitism in the United States.

The report says there is a "revival of anti-Jewish stereotyping in the media and arts," including the movies, "Fritz The Cat," and "Portnoy's Complaint," based on the book by Jewish novelist Philip Roth.

Arnold Forster, the League's associate director, said in an interview that an upcoming ABC-TV production of Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice," does not permit the viewer "to forget the Jewishness of Shylock," a usurer who is the protagonist in the play.

Many enlightened at clinic

By MIKE BROPHY
MDC Staff

The seventh annual UMass baseball clinic was held Saturday morning in Curry Hicks Cage and was an interesting session for nearly 400 high school athletes and coaches.

Coach Archie Allen of Springfield College was on hand to give a short talk on the techniques of base running. He talked of things such as cutting down the large turns a runner may take when rounding a base as those extra steps give a fielder more time to throw the ball to a waiting fielder attempting to make a putout.

Allen also lent his knowledge to the audience on the art of sliding, showing the proper positioning of the legs as he slid across the basketball floor in the Cage.

Stan Benjamin, scout for the Houston Astros and former baseball coach at Greenfield High School, talked at length on batting and bunting skills, enlightening many a ballplayer on the various techniques of weight control while swinging and the placement of the feet as well as the movement of the head in controlling the whole coordination of the body.

Jeff McKay and Dick Bergquist delivered short talks on topics such as rule changes, motivation, and ideas on equipment and practice routines.

Bergquist, UMass varsity baseball coach, said after the clinic was completed, "If one boy or coach left here today having learned just one thing, then this was a success. I was pleased with the turnout and I think they got a lot out of it."

Many distributors of baseball equipment were on hand with some displays to show the coaches and to present new ideas of their own.

A new man at the Oakland A's spring training camp in Mesa, Arizona is Vida Blue. Blue has missed the last two springs while he was negotiating a salary with controversial owner Charles Finley. Here he is talking to new manager Alvin Dark.

Vida blue no more; shows fine attitude

By ERIC PREWITT
AP Sports Writer

MESA, Ariz. (AP) — The Oakland A's have called off their search for the old Vida Blue — they're excited about the new one.

"I've never seen him with such great desire and attitude — I guess those are the right words — before," pitching coach Wes Stock said after the opening week of spring training.

The left-handed pitcher admitted, "If I could predict my season performance on how I feel now, I'd say I was going to be a 50-game winner."

But, he added, "I don't set goals. I just want to be part of the team."

And for the first time since 1971, when he was the best pitcher in baseball with a 24-8 record, a 1.82 earned run average and 301 strikeouts, Blue was part of the A's squad when spring training opened.

"I'm not used to being here before March. I might tire out before the season opens," Blue quipped after an early workout at Mesa's Rendezvous Park.

Blue held out until late March — even announced he was quitting baseball — before signing his contract in 1972. Last year, he arrived here in early March after a shorter holdout.

This year, he accepted owner Charles O. Finley's offer for an estimated $75,000 after a three-minute telephone talk.

"I guess he was in a good mood," Blue said of Finley.

It must have been infectious.

Vida Blue, an often-moody young man the past two seasons, is in a good mood as his fourth big league season approaches. And he's in excellent shape after a winter that included weight-lifting to strengthen his legs.

When he posted a 20-9 record last season, coming back from his 6-10 mark in the year of the big holdout, people stopped worrying about what had become of his 1971 fastball.

"In 1971, I won half my games before anyone knew what I was throwing," the 24-year-old pitcher says now about his first full season. "Last year, I threw hard and earned all 20 victories."

Ali, Frazier: what happens?

By TOM O'CONNELL

Assuming that most would wait for the Wide World of Sports presentation of the Ali-Frazier rematch rather than pay twelve dollars for closed circuit (which I treated myself to since it was the day before my birthday), I decided to comment on the fight now. This is not a report on the fight, that is unnecessary. It is a commentary on it and the implications of the performances of the fighters, two of boxing's greatest and still top contenders for the Heavyweight Championship of the World.

First off, I personally am not sure whether or not Ali won the fight. He definitely won the first few rounds against the late starter Frazier, but towards the middle of the fight, around the fifth round, Frazier began to come on. I had him winning a number of rounds consecutively starting at the sixth. Around the ninth Ali started landing his lefts again, winning him that round. Going into the tenth round the fight was, in Howard Cosell's words, "up for grabs."

The crucial factor, in my opinion, was not anything either fighter could control. It was the pathetic manner in which veteran referee Tony Perez, a supposedly capable official, controlled the fight, or didn't control the fight. The pattern was established early. Ali would run from Frazier, jab and throw his lightning combinations, and clinch when Joe attempted to follow up on the solitary hooks which he landed throughout the battle. Joe was denied the chance to follow up on his hooks by the inept Perez. Perhaps a man of greater stature would have beee more effective in controlling Ali's clinching, perhaps Perez was just too small to come between two heavyweights. But I don't think Perez recognized Ali's clinching as a tactic to pile up points, or if he did, it wasn't his size which prevented him from using his power as a referee, he just didn't care. I think his actions could have drastically altered the outcome of the fight. But since it was not a title fight and the closeness of the decision is known to the fans, I don't think the result will affect either fighter's future too radically.

Joe Frazier is done. He is a shadow of his once awesome self. His punches will destroy you and I, but they are no longer capable of crippling the world's top heavyweights. The guts, the desire is there, but the physical ability is gone. Muhammed Ali is done. Some of the old speed is there, the durability remains, but with a different referee he would have been beaten by the shell of Joe Frazier. Against Foreman, the clinching would be met with powerful shoves which would send Muhammed flying helplessly across the ring, prolonging the moment when Big George's blows would finish him.

Joe Frazier could not in my opinion, eat Ken Norton, Jerry Quarry, or George Foreman. Ali knows this, and with a victory over Frazier in his last fight, he is unwilling to risk his chance of being the second man to regain the Heavyweight Championship by fighting any contender, especially Jerry Quarry, who Ali backed out on two weeks ago when he cancelled their scheduled May 6 bout at Madison Sq Garden. If Ali is going to risk being beaten again, the prize will have to be much greater than just another payday, it will have to be the Heavyweight Championship of the World. And if Ali takes that risk, it will be the last time he fights. There will be no excuses or critisisms of the officials strong enough to refute a knockout by Foreman, and with that knockout a great era of boxing will have come to an end.

MOUTHING MAULER — Muhammad Ali may not have many fights left in him, but it's a sure bet he'll never run out of words.

JV cagers: winning campaign

By STEVE SARACENO
MDC Sports Staff

"We're shooting for a .500 season," stated coach Chuck Olsen of his JV basketballers three months ago.

"It's my first year, and I'll be learning along with my players."

Well, Olsen's premier season is over, and one of the things he learned along with his team was that the junior-Minutemen could win.

The .500 mark was achieved and then some. They ended up with a 9-5 record.

And many of those nine wins were romps. Witness some scores: 87-41 (Rockwood), 78-57 (Rhode Island), 69-47 (Rockwood, again), and 97-69 (Thames Valley Technical Junior College).

Yet, in JV basketball, the matter of who won or lost is only of secondary importance. The performance of individual players is what merits primary consideration, since the JV's are, for the most part, a farm club for the varsity.

A couple of hoopsters caught more than one eye with their play during the season.

Billy Santos and Arnold Johnson, who had practiced with the varsity prior to the start of the schedule, were Olsen's seasonal one-two punch.

Santos, the flashy scorer and ballhandler, was brilliant in just about every game. Even in games when he didn't score well, his mere presence on the court seemed to make things happen.

Johnson, the lanky and tenacious center, was a vulturous rebounder as well as an eagle-eye shooter. Very few opposition pivotmen could handle him.

Watch for these two sophomores next year.

Another soph who impressed was Glenn Cooper. The forward's stylish jumper burnt many a cord, and with his 6'6" body, he filled in capably at center when Johnson rested.

However, two-year men weren't the only stars.

Forward Gary Kapinos, only a freshman, could score as well as anyone on the team. There were a few nights when it was like shooting into funnel for him.

Swing man Dave Tewhill, though not often among the leaders in scoring, made his presence felt as a tough defensive player and rebounder. He's only a frosh, too.

Other contributors to the team's fine record included freshmen: Mike Healy (a hard working forward), guards Stan Hodgin and Dave Strader (both spot starters throughout the season), Dave Couture (a forward-center who saw limited play), and guards Leroy Elleby, James Mosely, and Glenn Taylor, who all saw some action.

Also: assistant coaches Earl Edwards and PHil Roitman, and trainers Bill (Frito Bandito) Sangster and John (Human Bowling Ball) Hendry, who turned in some clutch tape jobs in pressure situations.

Group 1, 10-5

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Dick McAuliffe belted a grand slam homer and Carl Yastrzemski, Tommy Harper and Bob Montgomery also homered Wednesday as Group 1 defeated Group 2 10-5 in the Boston Red Sox first intrasquad game.

McAullife, a 34-year-old infielder, acquired from Detroit last October, unloaded against righthander Dick Pole, who took the loss after being bombed for eight runs and as many hits in three innings.

Rick Miller, counted upon to replace departed Reggie Smith in center field, drove in four runs with three singles for Group 1. Bernie Carbo, obtained from the St. Louis Cardinals, was the only other player with more than one hit, getting two singles in the seven-inning game.

The game was marked by seven errors, including a pair by veteran third baseman Rico Petrocelli, who underwent elbow surgery last August. However, Petrocelli uncorked a couple of strong throws, getting a warning at one point from manager Darrell Johnson to take it easy.

Craig Skok, who, like Pole, spent much of last season with the Red Sox, was the winner, although he allowed five hits and four runs in three innings.

Southpaw Lance Clemons, who had a 1-2 record in 35 appearances with Pawtucket in the International League last year, was the most impressive pitcher with three hitless innings. Clemons was obtained from St. Louis last March.

Veteran right-hander Juan Marichal, who was delayed in reaching camp, worked out for the first time and then watched the intrasquad game.

The 35-year-old Marichal, purchased from San Francisco after winning 238 games for the Giants, said he thinks he'll be able to start regularly every five days.

Aquamen set for NE test

By BOB HIGGINS
MDC Staff

Coming off one of their biggest victories of the season, nine members of the UMass swim team are preparing for the New England Championships beginning today at Brown University.

The Minutemen breezed past Rhode Island last Saturday at Kingston, 75-36, in their last meet of the season. In fact, the UMass swimmers took first place in every event to end a fine season on an extremely positive note.

The nine swimmers who will participate in the New Englands are Dick Blaisdell and George Kwiecien, co-captains, Duncan Lomas, Ben Crooker, Dave Boucher, Ron Boucher, Scott McNab, Carl Zulick, and Joe Hebert. With the exception of McNab, each of these men took at least one first place in Saturday's massacre.

The 400-yard medley relay team of George Kwiecien, Dave Boucher, Joe Hebert and Dick Blaisdell began the meet, winning in an excellent time of 4:00.8. Ben Crooker then won his first event of the meet, the 1000-yard freestyle, with a time of 11:34.5, beating the two URI opponents by over a minute. Duncan Lomas won the 200-freestyle in 1:56.3, with Ron Boucher finishing third. Dick Blaisdell followed with a first in the 50-freestyle, and was clocked at 24.0. After Carl Zulick won the 200-yard individual medley (2:17.3) and Chris Southard took third, the Minutemen had a 29-14 lead.

Jeff Crouse then won the first of his two victories in the diving events. He was followed by Joe Hebert and Steve Latter's 1-2 finish in the 200-butterfly, (winning time, 2:21.3). Ron Boucher then took first in the 100-freestyle in 52.9 seconds. The next three events were won by George Kwiecien (2:21 in the 200-backstroke), Ben Crooker (5:20.4 in the 500-freestyle), and Dave Boucher (2:25.5 in the 200-breaststroke). Crouse won his second diving event and the 400-yard freestyle relay team of Spencer Sullivan, Carl Zulick, Ron Boucher, and Duncan Lomas finished off the slaughter, winning with a time of 3:36.8.

The New Englands, which will last until Friday, will be another big test for the Minutemen. They have already shown that they have stepped out of the doldrums of the past few years. A few victories in this meet, which is certainly within the realm of possibility, would undoubtedly provide even greater hope for next year for Coach Bey Melamed and his team.

Win, tie, loss in IM hoop

By RUSS SMITH
MDC Sports Staff

The win: The Kamikazes of Brown won their first game of the season Monday night. The thing is, they did it without having to shoot the ball. How? Their opponent, Beta Chi, failed to appear at game time, technically giving the Kamikazes a 2-0 victory. The Kamikazes however did use the time to prepare for their season finale against the Issues. It'll definately be a tougher game (the Issues are in second place in the Indian League), that is, providing the Issues show up-which they probably will.

The loss: In the Lake League, the JFK Berkshirites were undefeated (3-0) going into their game vs. the Project Rap Crusaders (also 3-0) and came out of the game still undefeated as they stole a 49-39 decision. The 'shirites are an explosive team, averaging a little over 53 points a game, and have some good outside shooters, while the Crusaders have a team average of 38 points a game, and a better than average defense. But this game belonged to the Southwest team, as they broke for an early 18-4 lead. The Sylvanites fought back, but never quite made it. Prediction: The Berkshirites will remain undefeated, and possibly win the Campus Championship, with the Kennedy Panthers the only team with a shot at knocking them off.

The Tie: Luckily, the game was only between two teams from the same organization, otherwise, they'd still be arguing this one down at Boyden Gym. Kappa Sigma played Kappa Sigma "B" team to a 26-26 tie. Technically though, the win went to Kappa "A" 26-24, but I watched the game, and kept track of the score. And unless they've changed the number system, I'm right. Kappa "B" even thought it was tied, but being good sports, didn't argue. Somehow, the scorekeeper lost two of "B's" points. Someday they'll find them. Still, they were good sports-and that's intramurals for you!

Elsewhere, in the Central League, the League leading McNamara Strikers and Kennedy Grasshoppers will playoff against each other in their final game of the season Wed. night.

In women's basketball: Field Goal has clinched the Gray League with a 5-0 record...The Crampton Koales have the Beige League title...,In the Turquoise League, the first place Dupas (4-0) will play the second place Van Meter Vikings (3-1) in their season finale...and the McNamara Manglers of the Maroon League, will play their co-leader, the Coolidge Lakers in their final game.

Glenn Poster

Three's a crowd

Sports Flash - Denver attorney Johnny Dee, founder of the World Basketball Association, says his league will not commence play until the 1975-76 season.

What? Is this guy for real? Aren't there already two professional basketball leagues currently in operation in this country? This truly is unprecedented (a sports term). Even Gary Davidson didn't catch onto the idea of having three "professional" leagues in one sport.

Of course the next question is, "Where will the players come from?" How about the Boston Neighborhood Basketball Association? Could one of the teams use Clarence Glover? Well I know that I'm going to get in shape because I most likely could hook on as a free agent somewhere and become an instant millionaire. And this also goes for all you people out there who have dribbled at one time or another.

Where will the franchises be located? A good idea might be to tap cities where no professional teams have ever played so that the fans will come out in herds and droves to attend the games. Places such as Cody, Wyoming; Butte, Montura; Winnemucca, Nevada; and Juneau, Alaska will represent the Western Division. And the Eastern Division will include teams in Bath, Maine; Wheeling, West Virginia; King of Prussia, Pennsylvania; and Fargo, North Dakota.

I can see the headlines in the papers now. "Bath Takers Wash Out Fargo." "Cody Cowboys Lasso Butte." "Wheeling Put Into a Deep Freeze by Juneau Igloos." "King of Prussia Rulers Dictate to Winnemucca Whose in Charge."

This may not be the end by any means. The three leagues are, of course, the NBA, ABA, and WBA. That leaves three more possibilities for leagues open: NBL, ABL, and WBL.

There was an American Basketball League in the early sixties. It lasted about a year and a half and their most famous player was probably Connie Hawkins who at that time was being exiled from the NBA.)

Maybe other sports entrepreneurs will join the bandwagon. We have neglected three leagues in hockey, football, and baseball. (by the way I don't even think there's a second league in baseball yet)

So fans, maybe a "professional" franchise will be coming to your home town in the near future. And by then you many not even be a part of the paid attendance, because you and your friends may have to fill out the rosters of some teams.

JV gymnasts edge SC by .6

By CANDY GROSS
MDC Sports Staff

On Tuesday night, the Springfield JV gymnasts edged the UMass JV's by a score of 98.15 to 97.50. Since neither team has a definite junior varsity, several women competed on either their weaker events or those which they had some problems with at the Springfield-UMass varsity meet.

In retrospect, it was probably vaulting which cost UMass the meet. Springfield took the event by .8 points aided by the first and second place combination of Stephanie Jones (8.85) and Kim Andres (8.8). UM's Marian Kulick earned third with 8.5 followed by Anne Vexler's 8.4.

UMass did retaliate to win the bars event by a slight .2 of a point. A superb 9.0 routine by Anne Vexler was probably the highlight of the evening. Kim Andres (SC) took second with 8.7 followed by Heidi Armstrong's smooth 7.95 routine.

The score at intermission was SC 49.10 to UM 48.50, the .6 point spread which would ultimately decide the meet.

Balance beam was Springfield's as two of their gymnasts, Katherine Kolemainen and freshmen Terry Pasqua tied for first at 8.25. Margie Combs, back on the beam for the meet, threw a nice routine for second at 7.95. Third place was also a tie between Heidi Armstron (UM) and Stephanie Jones (SC) with 7.9. Springfield won the event by .9 points, exactly the spread by which UMass won the floor exercise.

First place on floor went to Margie Combs' 8.7, a significant victory since her shoulder problems at the last Springfield meet. Second also belonged to UMass, captured by Alicia Goode, as she threw one of her best routines for an 8.45. Completing the floor sweep was Marian Kulick with an 8.35.

This weekend the team completes their dual meets in Clarion, Pa. as they take on Clarion State College. The following weekend, March 15-16, finds them competing as the second seeded team in the Eastern Regional Championships at Curry Hicks Cage. Tickets are available at the Boyden ticket office.

Skaters give all, fall, 4-3

By DAVE EIBEL AND BEOFF KURINSKY

"If we skate our hearts out, we can beat them" said Jack Canniff the day before the semi-final game. The Minutemen did just that and more, but it just wasn't enough as they dropped a 4-3 decision last night to National Invitation Hockey Tournament-bound Vermont.

The Assistnat Athletic Director of Vermont predicted before the game that it would turn into a slaughter. He said "We killed Army, and we'll kill you, we're so psyched up." They were lucky, because the Minutemen made everybody at Vermont eat their words.

The first period started cautiously and surprisingly, the Minutemen had the first two chances as both Brian Mulcahy and Jim Lyons shot from close in. These resulted directly from brilliant UMass forechecking, especially from Steve Nims. In fact, the Catamounts didn't get off a shot for the first six minutes, but their second shot, which came at 6:42, put them ahead, 1-0.

The Vermont goal was a fluke. Ted Castle stopped the puck at the UMass blueline, and passed to Defenseman John Murphy at the right face-off circle. He moved around a fallen UMass defenseman and took a flip shot in front which was deflected by Willie MacKinnon behind Chick Rhealt, making it 1-0 Vermont. That's the way the period ended.

Rheault was a story in himself as he consistently stopped Vermont from close in, making incredible saves.

The second period was just like the first as Rheault continually made incredable saves. But at 5:22 Tim O'Connell snared an errant at the UMass blue line, and beat Rheault with a hard wrist shot from eight feet out.

UMass retaliated almost three minutes later when Jim Lynch stole the puck at the UMass blue line, pass to Carl Merchant who had gotten behind the defence. Merchant popped a wrist shot to Kiely's right side, making it 2-1. And that was how it stood at the end of the second period.

It took Vermont only thirteen seconds to score after the start of the third period. Bill Koch took a Tim O'Connell pass. His shot from the edge of the crease beat Rheault and it looked like the rout was under way.

But the Minutemen kept up their aggressive back-checking and fore-checking, and at 10:35 were rewarded with their second goal when Billy Harris back-handed a rebound past Vermont goallie John Kiely.

It looked like the Minutemen would bounce right back into the game, but unfortunately at 11:43 Mack MacKinnon scored his second goal, after taking a pass from behind the net from Ted Castle and beat Rheault with a slap shot from the edge of the crease.

UMass wasn't dead yeat. At 17:50 John Muse beat Kiely with a 10-ft wrist shot. Play was up and down the ice for the next few minutes, and Rheault was lifted by Coach Canniff with 1:01 left, and though the Minutemen tried hard, they just couldn't mount a sustained attack.

There were many keys to this game. Chick Rheault, who set a new UMass record for saves in one season, was just incredible, stopping everything save those few deflections and close in rebound.

Perhaps the major key in the UMass loss were unfortunate lapses in a few inoportune times. Every man on the UMass defence played their finast game of the season. But on every Vermont goal except for the first one, the Minuteman defence was just a little slow in clearing the puck, and against a team like Vermont, you just don't do things like that.

NOT ENOUGH--UMass, shown here on offense in an earlier season game vs. Salem State, had some of that offense last night at Vermont--but not enough. The Blade Boys succumbed to the No. 1 seed in the Division 2 semifinals, by a score of 4-3. Thus ends the season for the young skaters, most of whom will be back next year.

Minutemen shoot Cats down, 83-58

By MDC SPORTS STEVES

A touch of a stingy defense, a dash of fast break, and a pinch of some ungodly shooting...those are the ingredients of the UMass Basketball brew that choked UNH last night, 83-58.

Peter Trow, the spice of the night, led all scorers with 22 points. The senior hit an excellent 10 for 13 from the floor in his last regular season game.

Another outgoing senior, Al Skinner, scored a score (20 points), while pivotman John Murphy hit double figures with 12.

All in all, the Minutemen hit 62 per cent from the field, down from a 67 per cent first half. In vivid contrast, the Wildcats paws put in only 35 per cent and that was up from a 29 per cent halftime mark.

But shooting wasn't the only statistic department dominated by the Lea-men. The national leaders in rebound margin grabbed 15 more caroms than UNH, 49-34.

More stat lore: Rick Pitino had 8 assists to top off his regular season of playmaking wizardry; and Skinner made himself at home on the boards by collecting 12 rebounds.

For the losers, Steve Singelais scratched his way through the imposing UMass defense for 16 units, while Ernie Feragne came up with 14.

Though New Hampshire lost by 25, the rout could have been worse. The Minutemen kept UNH from scoring for the first five minutes, and had a 6-0 lead with illusions of a shutout. Of course, it was not to be, as the Wildcats broke the ice a few seconds later.

With the score 20-13, Trow went pineapples (not quite bananas) and scored 8 straight points to UNH's 3, and it was 28-16.

Then Skinner took over, and scored the next 10 visitors points, to make it 38-23, before scoring rights were passed on to another Minuteman.

The first half was a very untidy one for UMass, with 11 turnovers. Yet they made up for it with some superb shooting, and led comfortably at the half.

UNH, though soundly beaten, threatened time after time to close the gap, but were continually rebuffed by the Matt Dillon shooting.

Eventually the home team subsided and the garbage time so common throughout the year, came once again. So, everyone saw some action.

BROKEN BACKBOARDS — UMass finished the season at 21-4, and a precedent setting 11 conference triumphs...New Hampshire did alright, too, thank you, with their best season ever at 16-9...Jimmy Burke was back in uniform after his brief absence...the final selections from the NIT committee will come Monday, after the Atlantic Coast Conference tournament is over...the two top losers of this tourney will get the nod, with the winner going to the NCAA's...

Student towing proposal almost ready for review

By BARBARA VOORHEES
MDC Staff

A proposal to implement a student-run car-towing service on University grounds will be presented to the Student Senate and Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Robert W. Cage within two weeks.

Rick Savini, Chairperson of the student government Rents and Fees Committee and instigator of the proposal, is working with student senators and student Attorney Richard Howland to overcome difficulties which have arisen in making a legal arrangement that will be acceptable to both students and administration. Savini told the Collegian that his proposal should be completed by the end of next week.

Besides approving the concept, the Student Senate must also approve a budget proposal for the system before it can go into effect. Savini estimates the service will cost $20,000 for the first six months of operation.

If a lot is used to store the towed cars on it will have to be enclosed by a fence which Savini estimates will cost an extra $7,000, a sum which he thinks will be unacceptable to the senate. He is considering using the Campus Center garage for storing but Cage objects saying that cars can easily be stolen from there.

Cage told the Collegian that his main concern is with the public relations issue.

"If the Student Senate backs the system they've got to keep in mind that no one's going to thank them for towing' cars even if they are charging less than an outside service," said Cage.

Savini is waiting for written permission from the state Department of Public Utilities (D.P.U.) to run student tow trucks without D.P.U. license plates. Because the trucks will be towing only from state property to state property (always on university grounds) and will have state license plates they will probably not be regulated by the D.P.U. to have special plates as other towing companies are.

If the new system is approved it cannot go into effect until Jan. 1, 1975 when the University's contract with Amherst Towing Inc. runs out.

The system which Savini plans to propose will be run much the same as the present system but it will be a non-profit-making service and will therefore cost less. A person will not have to go off campus to get back his car and students will be employed as tow-truck drivers at an anticipated $3 per hour.

Free medication to stay; health fee to increase

By BILLY NEMITZ
MDC Staff

The Student Advisory Board of the University Health Services recommended the continuation of the policy of free pharmaceutical medication for UMass students Wednesday.

However, according to Barry Averill, Health Services director, additional funds for upcoming programs are still necessary. In addition to the improvement of several existing areas, Averill cited Dental Health, an Eye-Care Program, and a Women's Health Care Program as the major new developments requiring more money.

In its budget proposals for the upcoming fiscal year, Health Services originally included a proposed $7.50 increase in the student health fee for the next two years, resulting in a fee of $46 per semester. This proposal carries with it the guarantees that the fee will not rise during that period and that the medication would remain free.

Meeting with the Student Advisory Board on Wednesday, Averill stated that the proposal is being reconsidered. According to Averill, who still personally favors the plan, Chancellor Bromery has requested that all fee increases be minimized due to the fact that the University is placing itself out of the price range of many potential applicants unable to afford its student fees.

In response to the Chancellor's request, Health Services has come up with several alternative proposals. The Advisory Board narrowed the list down to the following:

-1) Sticking with the original proposal of a $7.50 increase for the next two years.

-2) An increase of $4.50 on a one-year basis, using virtually all of the Health Services' cash reserve to make up the difference. Subsequent fee increases would then be added on a year-to-year basis.

The Board was unable to reach a clear decision on which proposal to advocate.

Mark Citron, co-chairperson of the Student Advisory Board, came out in favor of the original proposal, saying the guarantee for free medication is a necessary item on the budget. Citron feels that it is a bad precedent to start charging for medication as it would lead to fees in other service areas which are presently covered by the Health Fee.

Those favoring the $4.50 increase felt that $7.50 was too much and that the cash reserves should be utilized, although it was pointed out that the reserves are relied upon for various emergency financial needs.

The Advisory Board decided to meet next Thursday to resolve the issue

N.H. House backs Durham denial for Onassis refinery

CONCORD, N.H. (AP) — The New Hampshire House handed Aristotle Onassis a stunning defeat yesterday by unholding the right of a seacoast community to reject a $600 million oil refinery proposed by the Greek shipping magnate.

In a 233-109 roll call vote, the legislators defeated an amendment that would have given the state the power to overrule local opposition in the selection of an oil refinery.

Olympic Refineries, Inc., which is owned by Onassis, had proposed to construct the huge facility at the University of New Hampshire town of Durham.

Nicholas A. Papanicolaou, Olympic vice president, said he was not surprised by the rejection of the Olympic-backed amendment.

He said he was returning to New York to confer with Onassis and that he expected it would be a week to 10 days before Onassis makes a decision on whether to seek another refinery site in New Hampshire.

Durham residents, in a non-binding referendum, voted by a 10-1 margin Wednesday night at their annual town meeting to reject the refinery proposed for Durham Point.

About 5,000 persons reside in Durham, home of 10,000 UNH students.

Gov. Meldrim Thomson, a strong supporter of the refinery, said he was "naturally disappointed" that the amendment failed to pass.

He said, however, "I am very pleased" that the House approved the site selection committee bill. The bill establishes a state agency to determine where a refinery could be located.

"I shall continue to do everything I can to try to find new sources of energy so that our citizens will not have to wait in line for gasoline or fear empty home and school heating-oil tanks."

"Cheaper energy for our people and a more abundant supply will come only in the wake of new nuclear plants, development of oil fields and construction of refineries," the governor said.

Federal energy chief William Simon commented on the Durham town vote in a terse one-line telegram to Thomson Thursday.

"I can assure you that if New Hampshire had a refinery now, the price of fuel to your consumers could be less and the availability of supply to your people greater than at present," Simon said.

State Rep. Dudley W. Dudley, D-Durham, who championed home rule legislation to allow Durham to reject the refinery, said she was surprised by the margin of rejection.

"Olympic's hard-sell propaganda campaign backfired," she said.

Wholesale prices up 1.2%

WASHINGTON (AP) — Wholesale prices jumped sharply in February but at a less explosive rate than the previous four months, the government said Thursday.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics said wholesale prices leaped by 1.2 per cent last month, far below the 3.1 per cent rise of January but still extremely high by ordinary standards.

The report provided mixed news for consumers. If the smaller rise turns into a trend in later months, it will mean that inflation is finally abating.

But consumers will be noting the higher prices at the retail level in the weeks ahead, primarily in food and fuels.

"Hell yes, we'll undress!"

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Streaking, the latest college fad of dashing in public in the buff, is changing readin,' writin' and 'rithmatic to running, rhyming and riding.

"Have you got the cheek to streak?" chanted a crowd of University of Louisville students Wednesday night.."Stop your grinnin', drop your linen."

Thirty students accepted the challenge and streaked, including one who carried an umbrella and explained later, "It was windy."

While a crowd chanted "Hell yes, we'll undress" at the University of California in Berkeley, three men and two women performed a nude chorus line dance atop a fraternity house.

Bare back met bare bottom at Central State University in Edmond, Okla., Thursday, when two male students wearing only ski masks and goggles took a cue from Lady Godiva and streaked across the campus on horses.

A streaker at Southwestern State College in Weatherford, Okla., also rode nude on a horse, taking part in a six-hour streak-in that began Wednesday night and ended Thursday morning.

Another lengthy streak occurred Wednesday night when 50 to 60 coeds and two men-one wearing a cast on a broken arm-dashed from dorm to dorm at Hood College in Frederick, Md., for 1½ hours.

With colleges and universities trying to set streaking records, the St. Louis University student radio station has set up the National Collegiate Streaking Association.

"We plan to compile streaking records from the colleges and to rank the top 10 each week," said Steven Huelskoetter, the station's general manager. A national champ will be named in June.

North Carolina at Greensboro won first place in the first rating and Florida State finished second for streaking performances last week. Ratings are determined on the number of participants, length of streak and size of audiences, Huelskoetter said.

In other streaking developments:

-Charles Valent, 18, of Akron, made good on his promise to streak in public on Thursday. A quick arrest occurred, probably because he chose the city jail lobby for his jaunt.

-Demanding racial balance, two blacks joined in the University of California streaking. "Blacks should be represented in streaking," said Eddie Tillman. "I did it because blacks should be part of a streaking quota."

-A man wearing only a ski mask entered the Bellevue, Wash., library Wednesday, let out a rattling scream, exited and dashed past the police station next door.

Town study panel eyes rent control at public meeting

Some 45 persons attended a public hearing on rent control at the Town Hall in Amherst Wednesday night with the Study Commission on Control of Rents. The purpose was to gather information from the citizens of Amherst about their feelings on rent control.

George Scheuer of Colonial Village raised the philosophical question of why private capitalism should infringe upon the pocketbooks of the people in Amherst who must pay rent to live here. He stated that the town of Amherst has the tenth highest rents in the state which should not be in a college town.

Kenneth Mosakowski of Crown Point Apartments and member of the Valley Tenants Association, issued a statement to the Commission saying, "should this Commission ultimately determine that rent control is not feasible, the town of Amherst should nonetheless continue to investigate practicable means to reduce the crushing burden of high rents which tenants must pay if they want to live in this community.

Some responded on a neutral basis stressing they didn't know much about the subject but feel that there is a definite need to cut down on the absorbitant rents in Amherst.

Steven Puffer of Puffer Construction and part owner of Pufton Village in Amherst took the floor speaking against rent control unless "electricity, heat, and taxes are added to the rent."

He said rents can't possibly go down until land costs, which are on a national upswing, go down. Rent is high in Amherst says Puffer, because "regulations, times, plans, and engineering in addition to land costs."

Puffer said people could alleviate high rents by "investing their money in building and buying homes." The tenants, mostly students, said that was out of the question.

After two hours of open discussion, Bloodsworth adjourned the meeting saying he and the Commission would take the data gathered at the meeting and look into rent control programs in Berkeley, Ann Arbor, and other higher education cities in search of a feasible program in Amherst. The results will be reported at the next regular town meeting in May.

Senate passes minimum wage hike

WASHINGTON (AP) — The Senate passed a bill Thursday to raise the minimum wage from $1.60 to $2.20 an hour — a measure almost identical to one President Nixon vetoed last year.

The measure now goes to the House, where a labor subcommittee has approved a somewhat similar measure.

The boost would apply to 56 million American workers, including 7 million who would be newly covered under the wages and hours law.

It would take effect in a series of steps, but most workers would get $2.20 an hour one year after enactment of the legislation.

The measure also would repeal overtime pay exemptions now in effect in several industries, tighten present law on child labor on farms and extend the scope of the law aimed at discrimination against elderly persons in employment.

The House version, would boost the wage floor to $2.30 but would take a year longer to do so for each category of workers.

The Senate vote on the measure was 69 to 22.

Stockbridge:small but unique

By PAUL BRADLEY
MDC Staff

There are slightly over seven hundred students roaming this campus who are not students at UMass at all. This sounds like a paradox-but these students attend Stockbridge, which, although located on University property, is an entirely separate entity.

Stockbridge is the "most separate" of all the unviersity schools, "sort of a Westfield State on the UMass campus," according to Paul Harcovitz, executive secretary of the Stockbridge Student Senate.

Although one of the smallest schools in the state in terms of the number of students enrolled, Stockbridge offers to its students 12 major programs ranging from hotel administration to animal science. Contrary to popular belief, Stockbridge offers training in fields other than farming.

This is not to say that Stockbridge does not train some of its students to be farmers. Stockbridge has its roots in Mass Aggie which started in 1863, and it became a separate entity in 1918 when Mass Aggie was renamed The University of Massachusetts. The Stockbridge school was formed from a land grant from the Massachusetts' legislature in order to maintain interest and promote development of agriculture in the Connecticut River Valley.

"The current shortages in food and lumber point out the need for this sort of training," says Harcovitz. "I think people are finally realizing the importance of agriculture. We all have to eat, you know."

The curriculum at Stockbridge also includes Environmental Science, food processing, turf management, and landscape operations as well as the basic agricultural courses.

As well as offering a diversified curriculum in its own right, Stockbridge students enjoy the opportunity to elect any regular UMass course. "Every Stockbridge student enjoys a number of advantages over the regular UMass student," said Harcowitz.

"First of all, with the two year program, most of the students know what field that they are going to enter. Most have a very clear goal to reach for. Also, Stockbridge students don't have to go through the CORE requirements that all Umies have to meet."

Although Stockbridge is considered to be a separate entity, students there are considered to be UMies in most respects. They enjoy all the advantages of the Campus Center and all of her facilities that are available to regular UMass students.

The only significant difference is that students at Stockbridge are not allowed to compete in sports at the university level. Stockbridge does field teams in basketball, soccer, and golf. As far as administrative procedures are concerned--such as Financial Aid and Housing, Stockies are considered to be regular students at UMass.

For all the advantages that the Stockies enjoy, Harcovitz pointed out that there are very few disadvantages. "The only one is that we have to fight for our identity in the university community. We have to function as a separate entity."

Harcovitz pointed out that the Hotel, Restaurant, and Travel Administration (HRTA) program, currently under Stockbridge, is being phased out. "This year's freshman class will be the last to be accepted into this program. This program will be picked up by the state community colleges, and the four year program here at the university will be strengthened--as well as more emphasis on the graduate level." The Environmental Science program is undergoing a similar transformation, Harcovitz said.

Currently, a Stockbridge Graduate earns an associate's degree in his field, with an opportunity to go right to work or to transfer to a University to seek a bachelor's degree. Harcovitz pointed out that there is a program where Stockies can easily transfer to UMass. He also pointed out that Stockbridge graduates have a higher job placement percentage than do graduates of UMass.

Stockbridge derives both its advantages and disadvantages from being so small. It is no longer a school of farmers but like the university itself, offers training in different and diversified fields.

Council head in fight over program changes

Program Council is in the process of reorganization, according to Bob McDonnell, chairman of Program Council.

A dispute disrupted after Noel Conley claimed in his feature, "Political Games," in the March 1st edition of Below The Salt that Program Council was dead.

"I don't mind critisism, but not irresponsible critisism," McDonnell replied. "Further checking would have doubted the substance of the article."

Gary Gomes, assistant editor of Below the Salt, agreed there were inaccuracies in the article, but he would accept any article.

"I want as much input about politics as possible. This is the purpose of Below The Salt," Gomes said. "Accepting any article helps maintain interest in political happenings on campus."

A committee has been appointed and is in the process of studying the problems of Program Council, according to McDonnell.

Program Council does the programming on behalf of the Campus Center. However, at this time there is no one responsible for refusing programming.

"The council should be set up in such a way that it fits the needs of the students and is responsible fiscally," McDonnell said.

"There should be a variety of programs on campus. People are concerned, but the programming is not balanced," McDonnell said.

Women's Day joins working women

By ZOE BEST

The earliest known strike of women factory workers took place at Pawtucket, R.I. in 1824 where they joined men in striking against a wage cut and longer hours. The 102 young women held their strike meetings separate from men.

In 1828 in Patterson N.J. women again participated in a strike; the basic demand of a ten-hour day was refused and backed up by calling of the militia.

The first strike where women workers alone took part was in Dover N.H. in 1828. In 1834, 800 textile workers struck and as reported:...one of the leaders mounted a stump and made a flaming Mary Wollstonecraft speech on the rights of women and the inequities of the "monied aristocracy", which produced a powerful effect on her auditors, and they determined to "have their way if they died for it."

In Woman, published in Springfield, Mass. in 1901, Lucy Larcom notes that "in Chicago, the girls of the shop, fifteen, sixteen and twenty years of age, were kept at work thirty-three hours at a time without sleep and only a brief stop for black coffee. And it is no unusual thing for them to work fifteen and sixteen hours per day, that is from five o'clock in the morning to nine and ten o'clock at night. At this high pressure, which is suicidal or homicidal, they earn from $4.00 to $8.00 per week.

At Fall River in 1848, 800 operatives struck several cotton mills over a reduction of wages The strike lasted three weeks, with considerable rioting, and was violently ended.

On March 8, 1857 women garment-textile workers on the Lower East Side marched from the poor district to the more affluent area. They wanted higher wages and a working day of twelve hours. The march was dispersed with police, some women were trampled. Three years later these women had formed a union.

On March 8, 1908 thousands of women marched on the same issues.

On March 8, 1908 thousands of women marched from the lower East Side of New York City and demanded the same as 61 years earlier. Added to them were demands for legislation against child labor and the right to vote.

In 1910 at the International Socialist Congress in Copenhagen on a motion proposed by Clara Zetkin, those attending proclaimed March 8 International Women's Day, to commemorate those women who struggled for a better life.

This year a victory for over 3000 garment workers, mostly Chicana resulted after 21 months strike against Farah to gain recognition of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America. Now the union can take up other issues. The average take-home pay of a Farah worker is $69 a week and they begin at $1.70 an hour.

With the contraction of the economy and many lay-offs due there may a rash of strikes. The United Mine Workers, 15,000 are on strike because of lack of fuel to get to the mines. Their contracts end in November and this last fall in Harlan County, Kentucky women and children were jailed when they replaced their husbands who had been arrested for picketing, because of unsafe working conditions.

In our own area, waitresses, which is the fourth largest employment category for women in the nation, are on strike at Joe's Cafe and the Ramada Inn. At Hampshire College secretarial and office workers are forming their own local of the Distributive workers union. The Valley Women's Union located in Northampton, among other functions acts as support contingent to women strikers.

Women have contributed to the productive capacity of the United States and will continue to do so, but as before in the past women will demand rectification for any inequality they suffer.

Most of this labor herstory was collected and compiled by Laurie Nisonoff, Yale.

Grad Research vandalism: one helluva problem for all

By CINDY ROGERS

The Grad Research Center (GRC) is only one year old and already graffiti, computer vandalism and ripped-out partitions in men's rooms are a common site.

"The writing on the plaster walls is the main problem," Curt Snow, head janitor, told the Collegian. "It's a helluva job to get it off."

It takes at least two hours and often the crayon and pen marks makes it too difficult to get it off at all. It is the janitor's job to keep the building clean but having to wash the walls twice a week is "not in their line of duty." Curt Snow also said that as soon as they wash the walls, the writing starts all over again.

(Staff Photo - Dennis Conlon)

The writing on the wall. Who does it and why?

The graffiti, a common site on the 18th floor lookout is not the only place where it is found. Other areas are the lavatories, the corridors and the classrooms.

Other problems, the janitors seem to be having are water damage from pulled out fire hoses, broken furniture, cigarette butts burning out the rugs and heel marks on the walls.

Curt Snow does not believe it is just UMass. students. "The center," he said is open 7 days a week from 7 a.m. to 1 a.m. and most of it happens on weekends." He has seen this type of destruction in all of the 8 years he has been a janitor at UMass. But what he can't understand is "Why do they do it?"

"We try to help the students as much as possible", he said. "If a notebook is left in a classroom, we lock it up in a closet before handing it over to lost and found. If furniture needs moving, we move it even though it is not part of our job."

Snow asked the Collegian if students have something against the janitors, personally. When he sees someone writing on the walls or being destructive, he will usually ask them why. "Most students, he said, reply that they don't know and just walk away." About 1 per cent do give the janitors a hard time and reply, "Who the hell are you?"

"The janitors," Snow continued, "gets it from all ends." The professors complain and the physical plant wonders if the janitors are doing their job. Snow has asked professors to stop any destruction in the classroom, but feels that they may be too busy to take notice of it.

"The professors are disturbed over the destruction," H.N. Line of Biochemistry told the Collegian. He said he has commented to students who put out cigarette butts on the floor.

The physical Plant was not able to give the Collegian any "significant" figures on damages occuring in the Grad Research Center.

The Computer Center in the GRC has had two terminal phones ripped off the walls in the past year. Dave Musante, director of the center figures the cost of replacement and installation of a phone to be around $61. He added that "six weeks ago, a computer terminal was stolen out of the Grad Research tower." The cost of the terminal was estimated at $1,400.

The Grad Research Center is not the only building on campus that is a victum of vandalism. Graffiti and destruction can be found in dorms, elevators and classrooms throughout campus.

The question, remains, WHY DO STUDENTS DO IT?

Wednesday, the Collegian spoke to various members of the Psychology Faculty, who all agreed that there hasn't been any conclusive research done in this area.

Norm Simonson said that any theory on his part would only be "speculation."

Sheldon Cashden told the Collegian that the vandalism could be explained with any number of models. He further explained that from "a psychanalytic model, ripping out toilet seats could be the result of harsh toilet training." "But," he continued, "the same act could be explained with a communication model." The student may be angry at his professor and this is how he is communicating that anger. Or if one uses a demonic model, then the "devil made the student do it."

Ivan Steiner, a social psychologist viewed graffiti and destruction as a form of anger and "seeing other students do it legitimizes it for him."

Finally, B. Nelson-Shapiro doesn't know of any theories on the subject, but she finds it an interesting one to pursue.

International Student Week: a different event this year

International Student Fair, scheduled to open at 11:00 a.m. Saturday March 16th in the Campus Center Auditorium, is a different event this year. Under active student leadership, it will feature a whole week of evening events leading up to the opening of the Fair itself. And there are other changes.

Said Ravi Kulkarni, of India, one of the energetic student organizers, "This year there was real question whether there would be a Fair until enough foreign and American students decided on their own that it was a good idea. Then we brainstormed for ideas, rather than letting a small inner group determine what events would take place and how."

As a result, the Fair will feature interest areas rather than nationality booths; Teaching Events (e.g. how to wrap a sari or use chopsticks), a "sidewalk cafe" where all the international foods will be clustered, sales booths and a Children's Corner are typical areas where different new activities will be tried. Admission is free.

"At the Fair we will have Scotch bagpipers at 1 p.m. and at three," said Sridhar Ramadas, President of the International Student Association sponsoring International Student Week. "But the events preceding the Fair itself are something special. We are still accepting entries for the color slide contest on Wednesday evening at 7:30, which will be shown in the Campus Center, enjoyed and awarded prizes.

"And in conjunction with the Japanese-American Club we are showing the film IKIRU by Akira Kurosawa at 7:30 p.m. on Friday. Admission is 75 cents, but unless you buy a raffle ticket on a TV set or enjoy international wine or food, that is the only event that will necessarily cost you money."

The international folk dancing, exhibits, sights and smells are free. At the Campus Center Auditorium next weekend.

Program of events: All weekday events in the Campus Center starting at 7:30 p.m.; Monday, CC 168, Panel Discussion on prospects for world peace; Tuesday Mar. 12. CC 168, student presentation and simulations on population, world resources and Global Survival; Wednesday Mar. 13, CC 917, color slide photo contest; Thursday Mar. 14, CC 168, panel discussion on foreign student viewpoint; Friday Mar. 15, Thompson 106, IKIRU (movie by Kurosawa).

Higher ed. debated in House

STATE HOUSE, BOSTON - State colleges are not driving private colleges out of business according to Massachusetts Chancellor of Higher Education Patrick E. McCarthy.

Chancellor McCarthy made the remark at a hearing before the House Committee on Ways and Means on the Board of Higher Education request of $228 million in the fiscal 1975 budget.

The hearing was part of the committee's continuing examination of Gov. Francis W. Sargent's $2.7 billion state budget for fiscal 1975.

Deficits in private colleges began to mount, Chancellor McCarthy reported, when private schools started granting aid to students.

He said state aid enters private schools through the state scholarship program.

"By law, 75 percent of scholarship money must be given to private students," he said, "but in reality the percentage is more like 80 percent."

Chancellor McCarthy's request for $15 million for scholarships was trimmed to the fiscal 1974 level of $9.5 million by the state Office of Administration and Finance.

But at the hearing, the Chancellor repeatedly used the $15 million how much we really need for scholarships? Forty million dollars."

Committee Vice-Chairman Joseph D. Early (D-Worcester) questioned the fairness of working class youngsters not being able to afford to attend private schools, and suggested the Board needed a new set of priorities.

"We need more money," Chancellor McCarthy responded to the vice-chairman.

"That applies to everyone," Rep. Early replied, "but teaching professors."

U.S. and the world

Ehrlichman indicted for Ellsberg break

WASHINGTON (AP) — John D. Ehrlichman, already charged with conspiring in the Watergate cover-up, was indicted again Thursday-this time for allegedly sending White House agents to rifle a psychiatrist's office and lying about it later.

The federal grand jury charged Ehrlichman, along with former White House aide Charles W. Colson and four men tied to the Watergate burglary, with conspiring to violate the rights of Dr. Lewis J. Fielding of Los Angeles.

The felony indictment said the intent was "to search for confidential information concerning Daniel Ellsberg" in the September 1971 break-in.

At the time, Ellsberg was under indictment for unauthorized possession of classified materials-held responsible for leaking the Pentagon Papers, a study of the development of the Vietnam war.

Ehrlichman, who resigned as President Nixon's top domestic adviser last April 30, had denied knowing in advance about the Fielding break-in but said national security could justify it.

The White House special investigations unit, nicknamed the Plumbers, had been put in his charge by President Nixon.

The conspiracy charge, carrying a maximum 10 years in prison and a $10,000 fine, named Ehrlichman, Colson, G. Gordon Liddy, Bernard L. Barker, Felipe DeDiego and Eugenio R. Martinez.

Additionally Ehrlichman alone was charged in one count of lying to the FBI and three of lying to the grand jury. Each carries a maximum five-year prison term and a $10,000 fine.

If convicted on all counts in the Watergate cover-up and Ellsberg case indictments, Ehrlichman would be liable for a 55-year prison term. He also is scheduled for trial April 15 on conspiracy, burglary and perjury charges in Los Angeles.

Deputy District Atty. Stephen Trott, the prosecutor of the state case, said he will fly to Washington with Dist. Atty. Joseph Busch Monday for a conference with special Watergate prosecutor Leon Jaworski.

"We've done a lot of groundwork," he said, "but now we have to get together and decide how this will be handled."

California statutes are that a person once tried elsewhere for specific activities should not be tried for the same activities again in the state.

Colson, facing his second indictment in six days, restated his innocence and said "there is much the public has not been told about circumstances surrounding this matter. A great deal more may be revealed in the course of this proceeding." Colson formerly was special counsel to Nixon.

Barker and Martinez pleaded guilty to breaking into the Watergate office building quarters of the Democratic National Committee. Martinez was released on parole hours before Thursday's indictment. Barker is free on appeal.

G. Gordon Liddy, the stoic mastermind of the Watergate break-in and a team leader in the Ellsberg foray, was charged also in a separate indictment Thursday with two counts of refusing to testify or produce papers when he was called before a House committee last July.

DeDiego, along with Barker and Martinez from Miami's Cuban community-and like them a veteran of the Bay of Pigs invasion-was indicted for the first time. But he was named in the Liddy-James W. McCord Watergate trial as one of the men who broke into Watergate some three weeks before the others were arrested inside.

Barker heard of the indictment at a Spanish-language radio station in Miami where he was to broadcast an appeal to the Cuban community to attend an airport "welcome home" ceremony for Martinez and Virgilio Gonzalez, another of the Watergate burglars paroled Thursday.

"We will fight this indictment and we will plead innocent," Barker said. "I speak for DeDiego, Martinez and myself."

Thursday's indictment was returned by a grand jury impaneled in August 1973 — a time when the original Watergate grand jury had its hands full with investigations.

It named Egil Krogh Jr., E. Howard Hunt Jr. and David R. Young as co-conspirators in the Ellsberg case, but did not indict them.

Krogh was the former chief assistant to Ehrlichman and Young had been on the National Security Council when they were assigned the job of heading the Plumbers' unit investigating leaks of secrets.

Krogh had been indicted in Los Angeles, but the charges were dropped when he pleaded guilty to a single count of violating Fielding's civil rights. He was sentenced to serve six months of a 2-6 year term and is in the federal prison farm at Allenwood, Pa.

Hunt and Young were given immunity in return for their testimony before various forums and therefore were not charged, but Young remains a defendant in California.

As the court indicted Ehrlichman and Colson, the House Judiciary Committee considered President Nixon's offer to turn over the same evidence in the Watergate case that he had given a grand jury.

Members said they found the offer unsatisfactory, saying more documents were needed but decided against issuing a subpoena at this time.

And in related developments: — Government witness Harry Sears testified in New York that former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell arranged a meeting between the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission and a lawyer for financier Robert Vesco within hours after Vesco made a $200,000 cash contribution to Nixon's re-election campaign.

Mitchell arranged 'productive' meeting

NEW YORK (AP) — A government witness testified today that former Atty. Gen. John Mitchell arranged a meeting between the head of the Securities and Exchange Commission and a lawyer for financier Robert Vesco within hours after Vesco made a $200,000 cash contribution to President Nixon's re-election campaign.

Harry L. Sears, the witness, testified at the conspiracy trial of Mitchell and former Commerce Secretary Maurice Stans that the meeting with then SEC chief William Casey was "very productive."

Mitchell and Stans were accused of trying to abort an SEC fraud probe of Vesco's multibillion-dollar financial empire in return for the $200,000 contribution. They were charged with conspiracy, perjury and obstruction of justice.

Sears said he and Laurence Richardson, a business associate of Vesco, delivered the cash in a briefcase to Stans, who was President Nixon's re-election finance chairman, at Stans' campaign office in Washington.

He said the money was delivered on April 10, 1972, three days after a new law requiring reporting of such contributions went into effect.

Sears said Richardson opened the case on Stans' desk and tipped it toward him so he could see the currency inside.

"Do you want to count it?" Richardson asked, according to Sears.

He said Stans answered: "No, that won't be necessary." Sears said Richardson then stated: "Mr. Vesco wants me to deliver you a message. He'd like to get some help."

He said Stans responded: "Tell him that's not my department or bailiwick. That's John Mitchell's department."

Sears said he met alone later that day with Mitchell in his office after a prearranged appointment. He said he told him that the money had been delivered to Stans and that Vesco was going to give a total of $250,000, raised from foreign sources with only $50,000 on the record.

He said he told Mitchell that "I hope Maury knows what he's doing."

"I'm sure he knows his business," he said Mitchell responded.

SLA members may be key to Hearst freedom

HILLSBOROUGH, Calif. (AP) - Two imprisoned Symbionese Liberation Army members claim they want to save kidnaped heiress Patricia Hearst and have asked for a nationally televised news conference to outline their suggestions. There was no immediate response Thursday to their request.

SLA kidnapers of Ms. Hearst continually have linked her fate to that of the two SLA "soldiers" - Joseph Remiro, 27, and Russell Little, 24-who now say they may hold the key to her freedom.

The two are charged with murder and assault in the cyanide-bullet assassination of Oakland Schools Supt. Marcus Foster-a crime for which the SLA claims responsibility. They are being held at San Quentin Prison.

Little and Remiro did not elaborate on their suggests except to say they "might possibly be acceptable to the SLA, FBI and the Hearst family and which could result, if accepted, in the release of Patricia Hearst."

The girl's father, Randolph A. Hearst, president and editor of the San Francisco Examiner, said Thursday he had "no comment as of yet" on the prisoners' letter, which was delivered Wednesday to Berkeley radio station KPFA. The letter was dated Feb. 27.

Hearst has not heard since Feb. 20 from the SLA kidnapers who claim to have abducted the pretty University of California coed from her Berkeley apartment on Feb. 4. Organizers planned Friday to resume a fourth food giveaway demanded by the SLA as a "gesture of good faith."

Possible break between Church and State

MADRID (AP)- Dissident Bishop Antonio Anoveros was summoned to Vatican talks in Madrid Thursday while the government denied reports it was prepared to terminate its 1953 Church-state concordat over tte bishop's actions.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman said the unconfirmed reports from Church sources were "false" and "lacked foundation."

The Vatican made no comment on a possible rupture between the Roman Catholic Church and the Spanish government.

The break, if it developed, would leave the government free to try the bishop for what it called "a grave attack on national unity" by urging more freedom for the Basque minority. It would also mark the lowest point in Church-state relations since the end of the civil war in 1939.

The concordat, attacked by both the Church and state as an anachronism in recent years, bars trial or arrest of bishops without permission of the Vatican.

Bishop Anoveros and his vicar, Msgr. Jose Angel Ubieta, brought on the wrath of the government for authorizing distribution of a homily in their Basque diocese Feb. 24 decrying "oppression of peoples" and urging more civil rights for Basques.

The bishop has been under house arrest for a week in the Basque capital of Bilbao.

Informed sources reported the new government of Premier Carlos Arias Navarro had informed the Vatican, via Spains's primate, Archbishop Marcelo Gonzalez Martin, that it was ready to terminate the concordat because of the bishop's remarks and his refusal to leave the country.

A termination of he concordat would not officially affect diplomatic relations between the government and the Vatican. But it would mark the first time in three decades that Gen. Francisco Franco was without Vatican support. A devout Catholic, Franco has counted heavily on Church support since he won the civil war and came to power in 1939.

Israeli troops on alert on Golan front

TEL SHAMS, Occupied Syria (AP) - Reinforced Israeli troops and tanks were on high alert Thursday after warnings of a Syrian attack on this October war battleground, front-line military sources said.

Intelligence reports of the possible Syrian attack were cited as the reason Defense Minister Moshe Dayan canceled his resignation and extinguished a cabinet crisis that nearly forced Premier Golda Meir to quit.

Some Israelis had suggested Wednesday that the attack reports might have been more a device to enable Mrs. Meir to settle the crisis than a real danger.

But Israeli military sources at this front about 25 miles from the Syrian capital of Damascus said messages had been received outlining the proposed Syrian offensive and the political strategy behing it.

The reports disclosed that President Hafez Assad of Syria wanted to launch a limited offensive to heat up the Golan Heights front and apply pressure on Israeli-Syrian truce talks, arranged by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger on his last trip to the Middle East, are to start in Washington in about two weeks with Kissinger as go-between.

Israeli positions basked quietly in spring sunshine. Troops played soccer beside their tanks and rode donkeys across the Basalt Plain.

But front line forces were taking the reported Syrian plans seriously. There appeared to be no skepticism among the troops like that voiced in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

Any Syrian fighting, said the sources on the Golan Heights, would aim at following a pattern set along the Suez Canal in January when Kissinger was pressing for disengagement.

Cease-fire violations had flared daily on the canal front, adding to the urgency of separating Israeli and Egyptian forces, and Kissinger arranged it in a few days of talks.

Britain's industries back to full-time work

LONDON (AP) - Britain's new Labor government told the nation's industries on Thursday to get back to full-time work following the settlemenet of a miners strike that forced factories into a three-day week.

Energy Secretary Eric Varley decreed factories would resume a normal work week at midnight Friday after 68 days on part time. That will signal the end of the grave industrial crisis that contributed to the downfall of Edward Heath's Conservative government.

Coal shipments started moving Thursday from pits to power stations and state-owned steel plants on which much of industry depends for its raw materials. The shipments were the first since the 280,000 miners launched a nationwide strike for more money a month ago.

Varley said industry should get back to a full production "pretty quickly." However, the secretary appealed to Britons to continue to cut electricity consumption in their homes to speed the return to normality in industry.

Varley said the three-day week had cost about $4.6 billion in lost production and unemployment payments to temporarily laid-off workers.

Full steel production, cut by some 40 per cent during the miner's campaign, was not expected to resume for some weeks. That will mean many factories will not be able to be fully back in business for some time.

Heath's decision to put nonessential industry onto a three day week Dec. 31 sparked mass unemployment and cut most most production by 30 per cent.

The deal still has to be approved by the miners' union locals, but union leaders consider approval a mere formality.

The settlement came two days after Wilson's Laborites replaced the ousted Heath administration.

Simon predicts shorter lines as gas supplies increase

WASHINGTON (AP) - Federal energy chief William E. Simon tapped gasoline stocks yesterday to increase distribution in March and keep service-station waiting lines from getting as long as in February.

Simon announced increases in March averaging only about 2.9 million gallons per day-an improvement of about one per cent over February-but the increases were concentrated most heavily in states with poor supplies, and improvements there should be more marked.

The increases were distributed so that no state would receive less than 85 per cent of its March, 1972, gasoline supply, adjusted for growth of motor vehicle registrations since then.

Meanwhile, the American Petroleum Institute (API) reported that gasoline production decreased about two per cent last week, matching a decrease in refinery inputs.

The API, an oil industry organization, blamed the decreased refinery operations largely on "scheduled shutdowns for repairs" and "partially to lack of crude oil."

Both production and imports of crude oil slipped downward last week, the API reported, although imports of refined products increased substantially, by about 377,000 barrels a day.

In the last week of February, Simon ordered emergency shipments of gasoline from company inventories into 26 states and the District of Columbia to relieve local shortages and long gas station lines.

Although that emergency injection was to total some 7.8 million barrels of gasoline and it seeemed to be flowing, the drawdown did not show up in the API statistics, covering the week ended March 1.

Instead, the API figures showed a 5.48 million barrel increase in the gasoline stocks, to a new total of 226.5 million barrels, about five per cent higher than a year ago.

By ordering special allocations to increase the March distribution, Simon appeared to be dipping into gasoline stocks for another 6.76 million barrels.

Simon told the National Governors' Conference, where he announced the March allocations, that further emergency allocations could be made if new problems arise, but he did not think they would be nncessary.

Simon also told the governors he was considering the idea of lifting the voluntary ban on Sunday gasoline sales, to aid the recreation and vacation industry; but his deputy, John C. Sawhill, later told newsmen that Simon meant Sunday sales might be resumed after the Arab oil embargo against the United States is lifted.

Figures released by Simon at the conference showed that the states would have received widely varying amounts of gasoline in March, if Simon had not stepped in to order increases for many of them.

New Hampshire, for example, would have received only 61.7 per cent of its March, 1972 supplies adjusted for new vehicle registrations; Nebraska would have received 65.9 per cent and Wisconsin 66.8 per cent of their adjusted 1972 supplies.

Simon's action, instead, increased the supplies of 30 states to at least 85 per cent their adjusted 1972 levels.

Simon emphasized that the increases were coming from inventories, not from the supplies of other states.

Even the six states with more than 100 per cent of their adjusted 1972 supplies were untouched; they are Alaska, Kansas, Louisiana, Minnesota, North Carolina, Texas and Wyoming.

But Simon warned that he would start equalizing the distribution in April, allowing no state to receive more than 95 per cent of its adjusted April, 1972, base supply.

Egypt requests end to embargo

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) - Egypt has asked Arab oil countries meeting here Sunday to lift their five-month-old embargo against the United States, an Oil Ministry official said yesterday.

Informed sources in Kuwait said that rich Persian Gulf oil sheikdom also is ready to drop the embargo.

The ministers are gathering here-with the embargo at the top of their agenda-at Egypt's invitation, officials said. Their meeting originally was scheduled for Tipoli, Libya.

The Egyptian Oil Ministry official said it was switched to Cairo because of a lack of hotel space in Tripoli. But there was speculation in some quarters that the change grew from Libyan resistance to lifting the embargo. Iraq and the Palestinian guerrilla organizations also are known to oppose resumption of U.S.-bound shipments.

President Anwar Sadat proposed lifting the embargo in return for Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's help in concluding an agreement to disengage Egyptian and Israeli troops along the Suez Canal front, and for Kissinger's efforts to arrange a similar disengagement of Syrian and Israeli troops on the Golan Heights.

Resumption of shipments to the United States would help ease the gasoline shortage that has resulted in long lines in front of many American service stations. Authorities say the embargo is costing the United States about 10 per cent of its total daily needs of about 19 million barrels of crude oil.

President Nixon expressed optimism at a White House news conference Wednesday night that U.S. diplomacy in the Middle East inevitably will influence the Arabs to lift their embargo.

But he declined to predict outright that the Arabs will decide Sunday to resume oil shipments to the United States, observing that such a prediction from him might "lead them to do otherwise."

There were reports that Saudi Arabia and several Persian Gulf states in addition to Kuwait endorsed the Egyptian call for an end to the embargo.

The embargo was imposed after the October Middle East was as a way to pressure Washington away from support of Israel.

He said his goal was to being all state supplies within five per cent of the national average... The national average for March would have been 84.3 per cent of the adjusted 1972 base, but the extra allocations increased it to 98.6 per cent, with no state below 85 per cent.

Miss World fired

LONDON (AP) — Majorie Wallace, the 20-year-old Indianapolis model who last November became the first American to win the Miss World title, was fired by the contest's British organizers Thursday and flew off to New York.

The only previous title holder to end her reign prematurely was Brazil's 1971 winner, Lucia Petterle, who abdicated after only 10 days to return to her medical studies.

But Miss Wallace's dismissal was unprecedented in the 22-year history of the competition.

The sponsors of the annual beauty extravaganza, Mecca Ltd., said Miss Wallace had failed to fulfill the basic requirements of the title — good relations with the media, discipline and a "first-class public image."

The brief reign of the blonde beauty, steady girlfriend of millionaire racing driver Peter Revson, was marred by controversy over her relationships with a number of British pop personalities. These included former soccer star George Best whom she accused of stealing $13,800 worth of furs and property from her London apartment. She is to appear in court March 27 when Best is arraigned.

But Mecca cheif Eric Morley said the parting had been "friendly."

"Marjorie felt is was fair," he said. "I expect her to return home to America now."

The company's statement said adverse publicity surrounding Miss Wallace risked demeaning the contest and giving "the wrong impression abroad."

NY streakers puzzle elders

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Singly or by the hundreds, some college students in New York State are running naked in public, often alerting the news media beforehand to their startling sprints.

The "streaking" fad has puzzled their elders.

"I'd kind of be ashamed to run around like that. I'm not built that well," a state trooper in Saranac Lake said Thursday.

"It's more a joke than a crime, isn't it," he added.

At least 40 men ran four times around the quadrangle late Wednesday at Paul Smiths College, near Saranac Lake, freshman Fred Fox said. "We got a little numb after a while," Fox said. He said the temperature was 47.

A solo streaker raced through Buffalo's largest indoor shopping center, the Main Place Mall, Thursday and then jumped into a waiting auto.

About the same time, eight male students wearing only sneakers ran in front of the library building at Fulton-Montgomery Community College, near Johnstown, to the cheers of hundreds of students. No arrests were reported.

A campus radio station at New Paltz State College said about 100 persons-including some women-ran nude on the campus late Wednesday, Columbia University in New York City reported its second streaking incident in two days and an unidentified student reported streaking occurred Thursday at Chatham High School in Columbia County.

A young man wearing a black tie and a bag over his head ran through the high school cafeteria to the cheers and laughter of spectators, the student said.

Chatham Principal Richard Kraham refused to confirm or deny the report, saying, "The less said, the better."

Five Marist College students accused of dashing nude through the center of Poughkeepsie early Thursday pleaded innocent to charges of public lewdness.

"They weren't too hard to spot. There's not too many nude people out at night," one policeman said.

In Buffalo, police said they caught two streakers, using a police dog to track down one of them. David Tobin, 24, and Michael Kempf, 20, both of Buffalo, were charged with disorderly conduct and public intoxication.

Streaking: spring madness

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Rhode Island's attorney general does not plan to prosecute streakers

Streaking is "just another aspect of spring madness" according to Atty. Gen. Richard J. Israel.

The college student craze of running naked might be illegal, depending upon the circumstances, Israel said, but it "calls for a sensitive evaluation of standards of decency that we are not prepared to do."

However, the dean of students at the University of Rhode Island has told campus streakers that they are violating the law, and warned the university may call in local police if the fad gets out of hand.

Dr. Paul W. Brubacher said any streaker taken into custody by police will be subject to normal disciplinary procedures used for students who have been arrested. The dean's statement came in reaction to an early Wednesday morning streak by some 35 male students before pajama-clad crowds.

However, just a few hours after Brubacher's warning, about 40 students ran naked past seven dormitories while an estimated 500 spectators cheered them on.

One of the 40 streakers was a female student identified only as Joan. "It's like flying. You don't realize you have your clothes off," she said.

Meanwhile, some 20 Roger Williams College students celebrated their basketball team's upset victory over rival Bryant College by running naked through the Bristol campus. Not to be outdone, about 25 Bryant students also streaked before an estimated crowd of 300.

Streaking on Rhode Island campuses got its official start early Tuesday at Providence College. A school spokesman said, "My personal opinion is that when the media stops publicizing it, it will stop by itself."

McLuhan: streaking not new

TORONTO (AP) - Marshall McLuhan, University of Toronto English professor, said Wednesday that streaking, the fad of running nude in public, is not new.

"A friend of mine did it 20 years ago," he said in an interview after receiving a civic Award of Merit.

McLuhan said his friend, Louie Van Gastrin, of Amsterdam directed traffic in the nude on a bet.

"It took authorities 20 minutes to get around to arresting him," he said.

McLuhan, best known for his expoundings on communications, said the streaker is never naked but nude.

"It's only when you don't want to be seen that you're naked," he said. "A stripper back stage is naked, but when she is in front of an audience, she is wearing her public."

He said to the extent the streaker is caught unawares he is naked.

"But when he isn't caught unawares he is wearing his public so he is nude not naked.

"The streaker is, of course, putting the public on-one of the biggest things of our time, like a form of hijacking," he added.

Congressional reform: across the board

"To make the rules for the government of the land..." Sound familiar? Right, its from Article 1 Section 8 of the Constitution. In this time of perversely bad Executive leadership, and in light of the usurpation of Congressional power by the executive over the past forty years, it is time for us to realign the system of checks and balances our country survives on.

Truly, the reasons and circumstances for the loss of Congressional power are not always bad or ill-thought, but the circumstances which led our legislators to allow this theft are long gone. Given, President Roosevelt did need complete cooperation during the first years of his administration, and given also, that as the battle for power between that President and Congress grew in the late thrities, it was unavoidably put off by World War Two. Moreover, President Truman's conception of the danger of Communism in the post-war era was probably not ill-conceived, and probably did deserve tha maintenance of wide ranging Presidential powers.

But the fact is, as the fifties left us, so did the need for that super power in the White House. However, a simultaneous attempt to redistribute the power of the Federal government was not made. Not until recently has this been attempted.

Why so much time was wasted, or what happened to the concern for balanced government become secondary questions. Of primary importance now is what does the future hold?

The Congress is by Constitutional edict able to set their own rules. It seems this should be a substantial aid to those people now trying to effect change in Congress. However, it turns out that there are several inherent problems in the Legislative branch that must be exorcised before any quantitative reform can be successful. Reform of these problems will require a whole new attitude on the part of the individual Congressmen, and wide ranging education for the populace. Only a concerted reform movement from within the Congress, forced by an equally concerted move on behalf of the many concerned public interest groups, will effect the necessary changes.

Of all the problems, the most devastating is systematic secrecy. Clandestine operations, secret committees, under-the-table bargains, and overall exclusive attitudes of the members are seriously wounding the ideally open nature of our legislature.

In the House (where the bulwark of legislation and work is done), the problem is more pressing. Due to its size, floor debate is minimal, and, in fact, very little change of opinion is ever made on the floor. Most of the hard work is done in committee meetings of which a sizeable portion are secret. So secret that a shocking number of junior Representatives and aides are all to often uninformed of the minutes or decisions of these meetings. On the other hand, lobbyists have no difficulty in obtaining information about these same meetings. Apparently, the concern for secrecy is based on the fact that the electorate is the only quarter that should be kept in the dark. It is an attempt to isolate the decision making process from the public and keep it in the hands of a few narrow-minded, powerful Congressmen.

The latter exhibits another inherently bad process in Congress, seniority. This antiquated process has succeeded only in centering the Chairs of the most important committees in the hands of the Cotton Kings, while it has also prevented able people from acquiring the power necessary to promote social reform, from effectively blocking Presidential initiative, and from allowing new and fresh edeas to be implemented.

Partly because of the sheer power involved in spending twenty odd years in Congress and partly because of the attitude of the rest of the Congress, committee chairmen can easily stop any move on the part of subordinates to institute new ideas. Yet, there is a good possibility that the same people would be elected to those chairs whether or not the seniority system was in effect. While there are a few legislator's deeply concerned with this problem, their plight has been largely ineffective due to the lack of public reinforcement. However, Common Cause, the American Civil Liberties Union, The League of Women Voters, and others are now advocating these reforms.

We must also be aware of a problem which makes the others all the more evident, ethics. Consider this: How do we change anything if the people we elect are not responsible to their constituencies, and above that, not concerned with the responsibilities of their jobs? How can we expect good government, visible, accountable government from people who tell us they are going to Washington to promote our welfare while reality shows they do little except answer questions about Social Security and Veteran's Benefits? Who are so seldom in their offices that appointments are genuinely difficult to get? Who spend virtually no time in session? Who are consistantly carousing about Washington? Who, on the other hand, are so concerned about their own well being that they offer little resistance to the perpetuation of irresponsibility in Congress.

They are also the people who most avidly avoid the discussions and implications of election reform, for they do not want their personal records bared to show the special interests they are involved with, the gargantuan elections gifts, the kickbacks and pork barrel projects they have obtained for their financiers.

Unquestionably, these problems will be more difficult to eradicate than most statute based deficiency's. But if any semblance of democratic government is to remain, action must be taken and the realization of the possible duration and expense in both pecuniary and human resources must be consciously forced.

As to what can be done, there are many routes to follow. Right now, there is a vehicle available with which to effect change in the realm of secrecy. The media and others are trying to get Congress to allow more and more permanent coverage, including allowing cameras on the floor. While some people are searching for an alternative to alleviate the resultant confusion on the floor, the idea, if instituted, will force a good amount of professionalism to impress the folks back home.

Moreover, irresponsible representation can be repudiated by election. As a tool for popular involvement in governmental decision making, the election is unequaled. However, the uncontested election completely dessimates the ideal of popular control of government; electee's lose their concern for the electorate and conversely, the mere length of service on the part of the Congressman lends itself to disconcern and a feeling of impotence on the part of the electorate. Hopefully, awareness in the citizenry can and will serve as a control to single man, single party elections. Directly related to this concept is a recent raise in pensions for retired law makers to thirty-four thousand dollars a year. This attractive sum may be used to increase turnovers in the legislature.

Over and above these suggestions, there is election reform, incumbents who are now trying to effect reform, and the stress on publication of personal assets. There is no shortage of avenues towards reform, only means, and ideally, that is no shortage at all.

Who's best and brightest?

By CHILLY WILLIAMS

Hello UMies, Tonight we have a very special guest. The man who coached his school to an undefeated streaking season with no busts, coach UConn. A few boos from a UMies crowd that felt cheated out of the most prized trophy since the building of the library. For those of you who don't read the New York Time, there's an article about the long lost senior and how it can only happen at UMass.

"Coach UConn," How did you get your school in first place and what kind of program does UConn offer to its All-American athletes? "Well, it wasn't easy, it took long hard hours of practicing and we do have a large budget, that allows us to search out and find the best and only the best streakers" said Coach UConn. "As far as the All-American athlete is concerned if he's really that good we will hear about him or her," commented coach UConn. But some of the benefits that we do offer to our recruits are the best in the country. 1. Unlimited bail money; 2. A guaranteed job as an exhibitionist or psych experiment; 3. A guarantee to make the Who's Who list and maybe a chance to make Ripley's Believe it or Not; 4. King Richard always a pick-up a graduate if her or she needs a ride home while hitching.

Annoc: "Could the UMess come down one day and watch your team work out?" Anytime except Mon, Tues, Wed, Thur, Friday, Sat. and Sunday we have off," said coach UConn.

Annoc: "If you were coach of UMess how would you improve their record of no win and ten losses? Coach UConn:" "Well I could tell you all how to improve your record but I won't mainly because UMess claim to be the zoo capital of the country and we the people of UConn think that UMess isn't the zoo capital of the country. Ask yourself these questions and try to answer them. 1. What outstanding feats have UMess committed? 2. Why is UMess always last in getting into new styles? 3. Why do the students at UMess claim to be UMies, when in fact their not!

Annoc: Well that's all for new but be sure to get your tickets to the Last of The Red Hot Streaker's Show. And I would like to thank my special guest, coach UConn. Good-nite UMies and thanks for coming out to the Streaker Ball.

Signs ripped off

To The Editor:

We, the students of Grayson House Council, have really worked hard trying to bring the movie, "Play It Again Sam" to the campus. The competition was stiff but what the hell...Volunteers from our dorm went around putting up signs. Less than an hour later our signs were ripped down, replaced by signs put up by competing movies. Now as far as we are concerned, the students should have the right to choose the movie they want to see. It is upsetting to work hard at sponsoring a movie and seeing other people ruin your efforts. We actually saw these people tearing down our signs and when asked why, they said that they were our competition.

Come on, we are all students. Publicize your movies. We hope that you do well, but give us the same chance. In a university such as ours it is not necessary to let your lust for profit interfere with your responsibilities to your fellow students.

Letters To The Editor

Give Lovejey support

To The Editor:

This is in response to your editorial "Civil Disobedience," which dealt with the destruction of the Northeast Utilities weather tower by Samuel H. Lovejoy.

You state: "The Collegian cannot condone Lovejoy's action because it was violent and interfered with the personal property of another person--in this case Northeast Utilities Service Co...."

The use of the term "violence" without qualification turns it into but another meaningless scare word. A word appealing to prejudice rather than reason.

If Mr. Lovejoy's action was "violent" what is the nature of that violence? Was anyone physically injured directly or indirectly as a result? Did it seriously disrupt the owners' lifestyles?

Clearly Mr. Lovejoy's "violence" injured no one. His comparatively mild "violence" was an effort to counter the greater violence that would inevitably result to our environment if Montague was saddled with a nuclear power plant.

Your arguement that Mr. Lovejoy "interfered" (to use your language) with corporate--not private--property is rather limp under the circumstances. NU's tower is easily replaced. This is not the case with the ecology of the Connecticut Valley. The stakes are too high for even the most ardent defender of capitalism to afford to proclaim without question the sacrosanctity of private property.

You say it is unfortunate that Mr. Lovejoy could not find a "non-violent" way to dramatize the issue. Perhaps. But don't you wonder how many people are, as a result of his action, more enlightened about the violence that is being propogated against them by NU? How many were aware that NU, if you believe its vice president, Charles Bragg, was planning to sock us with that plant whether we liked it or not--or that there were plans for a plant in the first place? How many more people are more skeptical about the wisdom of a plant here now that Mr. Lovejoy has informed them in his statement that the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Plant at Vernon "had no emergency core cooling system until 1972"?

You yourselves admit that Mr. Lovejoy's "motivation and the result of his actions are both right and beneficial..."

However, I see nothing right or beneficial, either morally or pragmatically, resulting from your editorial. I commend the student senate in its support of Mr. Lovejoy and hope your readers will disregard your editorial inanities and give Samuel Lovejoy the support he needs and deserves.

Streakers' source

To The Editor:

Just as Maine witnesses the first streak of dawn every morning (yes, Cape Codders, the sun really does rise at Campobello), I believe that the University of Maine spawned the dawn of streaking in January of 1965 about 1:30 a.m. on a 20 degree below (or behind) Saturday night.

"You are there" in your best overcoat (no flashing please, cameras or otherwise) as the very tired and grubby future UMie returns to the University cabins from his cleaning the kitchen of the Bear's Den.

Only the center cabin in the ring of forlorn, yellow, kerosene stove heated shacks has a shower and our friend stands his clothes in the corner and sends 50 gallons of suds aad sweat down the hole leading to the Penobscot River a short distance away. Emerging, he realizes with a mumbled "F---" that clean clothes and a towel had failed to appear in the empty, gray shower room. He contemplates the frosted handle of the door leading across 75 feet of ice-covered gravel to the hopefully unlocked cabin nr. 4 and.....

Whoosh, a new sport is born as a smoking, ghost-like figure is launched in a "streak" across the clearing, yelling something about brass and monkeys!

The preceeding is perhaps little solace to the Maine basketball team, but unless the alumni association or one of your readers can prove otherwise, we must "raise our steins" to Maine for being to streaking what Springfield is to basketball or Dartmouth to skiing.

Parking and towing

As all faithful UMies know, our "beloved" Chancellor Bromery inagurated a radical change in the parking system last summer. It upped the fees by much dinero but in return, put in a much stronger parking system that guarantees a spot for everyone who pays for one, even though you may not get a desirable area.

Now, the student left is screaming. It seems as though the penalty for illegally parking in a lot was being towed away from that lot to Amherst Towing's lot, a total cost of $25. Hmmmm.

Also, it became a hassle getting a sticker. (It seems as though it always was.) But now, that doesn't seem to be much of a problem. The problem is towing and fine paying.

Let me say right out that if anyone parks illegally on campus, he should get tagged. In the case of a visitor on campus unaware of the rules and regulations, the University is generous about this.

Let me also say that if one illegally parks in handicapped areas, on sidewalks or where it hassles traffic, he ought to be towed.

And let me further say that a person who parks in "the wrong lot" ought not to be towed, just ticketed except that if a lot is full and someone assigned to that lot comes in to park, he should have the right to request the campus police to have any illegally parked car towed. This person should not be penalized because of a more lenient policy.

I have talked, informally, about this with Dr. Alan Gross, the Chairman of the Parking and Transportation Advisory Council. It is this body that recommended the more lenient policy towards towing. But there is a catch. The catch is that payment of fines will be strictly enforced, even to the point where one may be arrested if one doesn't pay one's fines. Of course, this is an extreme measure which should (and is) only to be taken if all else fails. I am openminded enough to wait and see how well it works.

But one thing I am not in favor of is student control of towing. It is not my feeling that the police are out to screw the students. The penalty of a tow must still exist because of certain circumstances regarding illegally parked cars where towing is a necessity.

Like most UMies, I don't really like the Student Senate and all its bullshit. I don't want towing and politics to mix. What we do have is fair and equal. It can only stay that way if the police remain in control of "to tow or not to tow?"

Helen Thomas, the victor

My journalistic comrade Schlemie Mendelbaum who works for the Strawberry Courant in Strawberry, Montana got very drunk after the presidential news conference Wednesday night.

I ran into Schlemie in the Beauracrat Bistro a few blocks down Pennsylvania Avenue from the White House. He was up to his eyes in scotch and had about him the look of a sad cow.

"Schlemie, Schlemie, what ever is wrong", I asked, "you should be happy, the president just made a fool of himself at the press conference again. Twice in less than ten days. Why are you so unhappy?"

"I know, Charles, I know, but sometimes the bafoonery of Nixon just can't liven up my days."

"Well, what happened, did your wife die, is your mistress out of town, what is it Schlemie?"

"Its that damn Helen Thomas", he wailed on, "she got the job I wanted, she's going to be the new UPI White House Bureau Chief, that job would have been mine if I hadn't lost a lottery in the White House Press room in 1968."

"Oh be Jesus," I thought, "Schlemie can't take the pressure of Washington anymore. He's flipped his reportorial wig completely." I decided to humor my confidant and asked him more about this:

"Schlemie, what are you talking about?"

"Well," he moaned, "I came to Washington the same day as Helen Thomas and we had to figure out who we would cover." We had a lottery and I drew Judy Agnew." I covered her for three years and she said all kinds of stupid things, but my stories never got printed."

"Why not," I asked, afraid now that the worst was yet to come.

"Because her husband said more stupid things than anyone else in the city, except for Martha Mitchell."

"So what," I asked.

"You nurd, Camelopard the Agnews had to leave town and I haven't had a thing to do for months. No one even knows I'm here. I didn't even get a Christmas card from the USO."

"Schlemie, I'm sorry, I can't put this together, why are you so unhappy, I still don't get it."

"Don't you see, that damn Helen Thomas just had to sit around and wait for the phone to ring and she became famous. I chased Judy Agnew all over the place, worked myself to the bone and got nowhere. It's just too much to handle."

"Schlemie, you have to turn this life experience into a learning adventure, now you know who makes it big in Washington," the Zieglers, and Thomas's the court jesters, the fool's fools."

Mendelbaum ordered another drink to wash that one down.

Sat. at the meat market

By RUSSELL J. CATALDO

Though my friends and I have long abandoned the campus bars in favor of saner forms of weekend entertainment, in lieu of proper transportation and financial stability we sometimes find ourselves amid the bustling crowd within four dark walls, and suddenly I feel as though I am an extra in an old Olivia D'haviland movie, the name of which I cannot recall at the moment.

So it came, one Saturday night not too long ago, when I was sitting quietly in my room trying to complete some of my professors' well intended assignments that an invitation came to me to accompany some friends to one of these establishments, the Blue Wall.

I threw my coat around me, checked my I.D. for the expensive though little used sticker on the back, and after a long walk in the nippy winter's night air I found myself standing on line trying to determine the method they used to decide how many people to let in. Once inside we suddenly became aware of a greater power looking over us for we found four seats together almost immediately.

We then purchased a pitcher and proceeded to do what ninety percent of the crowd was doing, drink and watch the other ten percent.

During all of this, one of my friends, a peer sex educator and feminist extrodinaire, wore a disgusted look. Finally she commented to me her personal conviction that "this place is a meat market". On hearing this I said to myself "she's drunk" but her words began to play in my mind as I tried to look at the crowd through her eyes in a critical light, instead of with my usual sarcasm.

Her analogy of "meat market" did not accurately describe the scene at the Blue Wall. Since most of those who come to the Wall looking for sex come with their intended partners, it is more in the way of a slaughterhouse, where the fatted calf is brought to be salted and blessed in a strange ritual before the actual slaughter takes place.

Slaughterhouse or meat market one thing is certain, it can only be considered on an amateur level. The Blue Wall would never be listed in any self respecting singles' bar directory. And in spite of all favorable rumors of fights and unsavory characters it will probably always remain the kind of place any serious barhopper will avoid.

The Blue Wall can be viewed as a kind of lab to those who can perceive that the education we receive here could actually extend into a field that some may find useful. Lab fee is one dollar plus all you can drink. Bar Dating 101 could become another gut course it only needs a few lecture sections.

I think I'll go back to looking at the Blue Wall in the mildly amused light which I always have. It seems I have relearned something that I learned some time ago; no one can take the Blue Wall seriously.

Justice: "the accused shall enjoy"

By BOB FOSTER

Justice. It's a strange term the knowledge of which seems open only to very few in our society today. As defined by Webster's New World Dictionary, justice is "the quality of being righteous." As defined by the courts today, justice is the power of being right. Indeed, one might ask what "right" is for all the world seems relative. Right, as implicitly defined by the courts, is the quality of saying the "right" thing at the "right" place at the "right" time. Justice then is as ambigous as "truth" or "free" or the entire gambit of political and legal rhetoric. Justice is what one (especially those in positions of power) defines it to be.

Let's examine some specific figures dealing with this asset that the entire legal system is based upon. The arrest figures for all criminal offenses except traffic violations number anywhere from 7 to 8 million per year depending upon the study one reads. Not included are the litigants in civil disputes, inmates involuntarily committed into mental institutions, etc. Further, if one includes moving traffic violations, the numbers become astronomical.

A large segment of our population obviously has a very direct relationship with the first step in the legal process, arrest. From this moment onward, the concept of justice takes over. The Constitution in Article VI states that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial...and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; ...and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense." Through such an adversarial method, justice shall be done and the system shall "live happily ever after".

Reality presents to even the most uncritical observer, a very stark and contrasting picture. Travel to Northampton District Court for an hour or two and observe the proceedings. Your illusions of Perry Mason and Owen Marshall will more than likely disappear from your mind as quickly as the coin from a magician's hand. Upon entering this noisy, crowded and mechanistic tribunal of the law, you may wonder if indeed the concepts of due process and speedy trial exist in any place other than the high school civics texts. Typically, the scene resembles the Chicago slaughterhouses of the early 20th century. Justice is performed in a quick (as opposed to speedy), efficient and definitely bureaucratic manner that defies the sensitivities of even the cruelest ogre.

One must not blame the individuals involved in such a bureaucratic machine. They appear as cogs in the most complex of automations. Their role is predetermined. They have been groomed by the system to work as the replacement parts in a continually malfunctioning machine. Instead, we must carefully examine a process that arrests 7 to 8 million people per year and sees a mere 10 per cent of that number in situations similar to the one just described. The further irony is the fact that the most just of all mechanisms, the trial, is more realistically a concept reserved for the television, not the courts. Instead, bargaining becomes the key motive, the spark that starts the legal furnace. Trial does not enter the legal experiences of 90 per cent of its litigants.

Thus, we are at the mercy of a seeming automation that knows no right or wrong, no morality or immorality. Instead, it knows the law and the "law" is justice.

Best to analyze Galbraith

Mike Best of the University Economics Department will present a lecture Sunday at 8 p.m., titled "Galbraith and Socialism: The Unconventional Wisdom," as part of the spring semester Project Ten speakers series, "The World of Learning." Best, who is a member of the Five-College Union for a Radical Political Economy, will give a socialist critique of Galbraith's analysis of the American economy and his view of human nature.

John Kenneth Galbraith, the Harvard economist and former U.S. Ambassador under President Kennedy to India, is the author of the recent best-seller, Economics and the Public Purpose, which Best will review shortly in the American quarterly, the Partisan Review.

In Bests's words, "while Galbraith has always recognized the weakness of Neoclassical economics and offers a profound critique of conventional theory, his writings nevertheless provide an inadequate theoretical base for progressive social change because he fails to identify the fundamental and decisive forces in American capitalism."

Best argues that Galbraith has admitted that the powerful multinational corporations, owned in the sense of "control" by perhaps only one per cent of the American people, are the dominant force in American life, responsible both for price inflation and energy crisis as well as the political corruption only recently underscored by Watergate.

This "power has become the centerstone of Galbraith's system, and the corporation is the center of power," Best says, but concludes that Galbraith cannot bring himself to explain economic power as stemming principally for the control over the forces of production and the resultant buttressing of hierarchy and social classes, racism and sexism, by the owners of capital.

Speaking next week, March 17, at 8 p.m. is Bill Connolly, of the University Political Science Department, discussing "Political Corruption: Behind Watergate." All events in the series meet in the Pierpont Main Lounge, in Southwest, and the public is invited.

Ombudsman helps students cut red tape

By EDITH WIEDER
Ombudsmah's Office

Well, UMies, you've had over a month now to find yourself the object of abuse by the intangible and invulnerable demons of the UMass Machine. Whether it be your English prof, the Whitmore Computer, Amherst Towing, the Southwest toilets, or the unconcerned voice on the other end of the telephone line, the source of your problem is causing you undue hassle and a mild-to-severe persecution complex.

You can stop banging your head against the wall (Excedrin's too expensive anyway), for there is relief available. All you have to do is call or visit the Ombudsman's Office, state the nature of your "bitch", return the smile you've received, and watch the RESULTS.

For those of you who are unfamiliar with this strange animal, the Ombudsman is a position presently filled by Jay Savareid; a position created solely to satisfy the needs of harried and confused UMass students, faculty, employees, alumni, even visitors who are faced with some problem or question concerning the University system. Problems the office deals with range from tenure grievances to financial aid difficulties, from teacher-student conflicts to housing problems. Another invaluable service that the Ombudsman's Office provides is access to information and handy news items which would otherwise never be exposed to the light of day.

The Ombudsman's Office is not a substitute for an honest attempt on your part to deal with your problem directly through the obvious channels. What it is, is a means toward opening a few locked doors, cutting through red tape, providing answers to difficult questions, and guiding you to the right office or person who ultimately has the authority to clear up the difficulty. Jay and the Assistant Ombudsman, Phyllis Foster, as well as the student assistants, Marybeth Carney and myself, do not guarantee 100 per cent satisfaction for all cases. What we do promise is an ambitious and concerned effort to attack the problem directly and solve it speedily--and all this done with the "personal touch."

You can often see someone in the office on a walk-in basis, but it is wiser to call and make an appointment. We're stationed in Room 919 of the Campus Center and you can reach us by phone by dialing 545-0867. Office hours are 8:30-5:00.

There are two other alternatives through which your problems can be solved. The first is to approach the Student Ombudsman located in your dormitory area whose task it is to represent you and hear your gripes. In many cases, going directly to your Area Representative may prove more convenient for you for he can be reached at all hours (well, almost) and he is in walking distance of your home. Each Representative is equipped to capably handle your problems; in the event that your particular difficulty is too hot to handle, the matter is transfered to the central Ombudman's Office for consideration. These Student Ombudsmen are: Mark Myers, Southwest; Marcus Buckley, Central; Jim Prelack, Northeast; and Jim Maltz, Orchard Hill and Greeks.

The second alternative provides you with the opportunity to write your questions or gripes on a slip of paper and drop them in the WHAT'S THE STORY? box located at the entrance to the Campus Center store. I'll try to answer as many questions as I can, as fully as I can, and print them for the benefit of the University community in the WHAT'S THE STORY? column, soon to reappear weekly in the pages of the Collegian.

So do yourself a favor. Don't allow yourself to be ignored or be reduced to student number status through your own illusion of powerlessness. You can help yourself by taking that first step into the Office of the Ombudsman, seeing your Area Representative to the Ombudsman's Office, or responding to WHAT'S THE STORY?

Notes, quotes and anecdotes

Indian art

Through March 22 the Art Department and the Fine Arts Council of UMass are presenting an exhibition Indian Art-Vishnu Murti.

The exhibit contains objects from India along with photographs and slides selected to show their original cultural contexts. The images on display in the University Art Gallery will range from stone sculpture from the monumental Hindu temples to metal and paper icons of modest household shrines.

A picture book explaining the images and their context in Indian culture is available at the Gallery, and a staff is available, by arrangement, to take groups through the exhibit and discuss the meaning of the objects in traditional Indian society.

The Gallery is located in Herter Hall. Hours are Wednesday through Friday 10-4; Saturday and Sunday, 2 to 5; Thursday and Friday evenings 7 to 9; and by arrangement.

Teacher program

A bachelor's degree is the main qualification for enrollment in the teacher certification program at UMass.

The one-year program offers such learning experiences as urban education, international experiences, alternative school environments and open classroom experiences. The program is designed only for teacher certification and is sponsored by the UMass Division of Continuing Education and the School of Education.

Candidates must have a B average or better in undergraduate courses and must be screened by the UMass Certification Committee. Deadline for application for the 1974 fall class is April 1. Full information is available from Ruth Greene, Teacher Preparation Program, Division of Continuing Education, Amherst 01002.

Moliere play

A comic love story for young and old, Moliere's "The School for Wives", will be performed by the Amherst College Masquers at 8:00 p.m. today through Sunday, and 15, 16, and 17 at the College's Kirby Theater.

The play revolves around Arnolphe, a foolish, aging French provincial who lives in terror of being made to look foolish by an unfaithful wife. To insure a faithful, loving wife, he has kept his ward and future bride, Agnes, in a convent since childhood "to keep her growing mind a perfect void." The play opens with the time for matrimony at hand.

Nature refuses to be so controlled and takes its own spontaneous course. A dashing youth, Horace, falls madly in love at first sight with Agnes, much to her delight and Arnolphe's despair. The comedy builds as Arnolphe's plans are thwarted at every turn.

Energy talk rescheduled

Massachusetts Congressman Paul W. Cronin's talk on the energy crisis at UMass today has been rescheduled to 1:15 p.m. in the East Engineering Building Auditorium.

The Fifth District Representative's talk is part of the Department of Mechanical and Aerospace Engineering's Seminar Series and is open to all interested persons without charge.

Right-to-Life Committee heads anti-abortion suit

PROVIDENCE, R.I. (AP) - Hearings on the Constitutional Right-to-Life Committee's anti-abortion suit against the state health department director were slated to continue before Judge James C. Bulman in Superior Court here today.

A Massachusetts obstetrician and gynecologist testified Wedensday that he believes human life begins at the moment of conception. Dr. William T. O'Connell of West Roxbury played a tape in court of what he said was the recorded heartbeat of a child less than 10 weeks after conception.

The committee's suit charges health director Dr. Joseph Cannon violated the 1929 statute establishing the department by promulgating abortion regulations. Cannon said he received legal advice that the U.S. Supreme Court decision on abortion did not allow him to consider the question of when life begins when drawing up the abortion regulations.

for people who walk on this earth...

If you've walked barefoot on sand or soil you know how great it is. Your heels sink low and your feet embrace the earth. Then you put on your shoes, return to the city, and become another concrete fighter... but the concrete always wins. You yearn for the earth that lies buried beneath the city.

The Earth Shoe is the first shoe in history with the heel lower than the sole... this helps return you to nature though you are forced to live in a cement-coated world. The Earth Shoe's patented design gently guides you to a more erect and graceful walk, and reduces fatigue and the aches and pains caused by our hard-surfaced city.

For men and women in shoes, sandals and sabots.

Marijuana laws may change

BOSTON (AP) - Legislation to legalize possession of one ounce of marijuana may be on the way to defeat, despite a lack of vocal opposition.

The legislature's Social Welfare Committee recenlty held a public hearing on several bills to "decriminalize" possession of the drug, but the committee's House chairman has predicted that "there's no way this will get through the House of Representatives, especially in an election year." Rep. Michael F. Flaherty, D-Boston, an opponent of the proposal, said even some legislators who might favor change in the law are unwilling to risk protest from their constituents.

However, this apparently has not deterred a bi-partisan group of 16 state representatives, who have filed legislation which would eliminate penalties for possession of a small quantity of the drug.

Social Welfare Committee Senate chairman, Jack Backman, D-Brookline, the leading advocate of marijuana law reform, said he thinks his committee will give a favorable report to permissive legislation.

Backman said that "legislators do seem to think it will hurt them with the voters. I don't happen to think so."

Backman has supported similar legislation since 1970.

Flaherty predicted that the strongest legislation likely to be approved is a resolution to Congress, urging change in the federal marijuana laws.

Flaherty said he was "amazed" by the lack of vocal opposition to marijuana "decriminalization" proposals at the public hearing. Police officials who usually testify against a change in the law did not attend, although the Massachusetts Police Chiefs Association sent a letter stating opposition, Flaherty said.

Nevertheless, Flaherty said, lack of opposition at a public hearing does not necessarily aid passage of legislation.

Persons currently convicted of possession of marijuana are paroled for the first offense. Subsequent convictions can lead to a fine of $500 or a six month prison term.

One legislative proposal-patterned after an Oregon law-would reduce the penalty to a $50 fine.

Several other proposals call for outright legalization of the drug, requiring state regulation of sales and permitting advertising.

Legislators at the public hearing said this is unrealistic, due to conflicting federal law.

Federal law was also cited by Flaherty as one reason Massachusetts could not unilaterally decide that citizens here could possess an ounce of marijuana.

Boston study

(AP) - A year-long study of Boston rape victims has concluded that rapes occur in all parts of the city at all times and include women from all walks of life.

"Contrary to the stereotype that all rape victims are mini-skirted women who walk alone at night, rape victims can be anybody," said Boston College sociology professor Dr. Lynda Holmstrom.

"Many rape victims believe they will die and expect to be killed after the rape," said Dr. Ann Burgess, a Boston University nursing professor.

Commune news

GREENFIELD, Mass. (AP) - Michael Metelica Rapunzel, leader of the now-defunct Brotherhood of the Spirit Commune, has pleaded innocent to four assault and battery charges.

Rapunzel was charged by Montague police after two girls, who police have declined to identify, claimed Rapunzel spanked them and cut their hair in two separate incidents after they said they wanted to leave Rapunzel's group.

Grad applications

CAMBRIDGE (AP) - The Massachusetts Institute of Technology said there has been a 7 per cent increase in graduate school applications this year and said it comes when there has been a general downward trend at many large, private universities.

Ronald S. Stone, graduate school executive officer and assistant dean, said "the quality of the students applying has risen, too."

The graduate school reported the increase as of its Jan. 15 preliminary closing date, it said total applications last year numbered 5,813 and that 1,907 were accepted and 990 registered.

"MIT is a special case for two reasons: our reputation for professional excellence and our ability to aid graduate students financially," said Graduate School Dean Dr. Irwin W. Sizer.

MIT said its undergraduate applications were up 20 per cent, primarily because of a 93 per cent increase in women applicants.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

For daily double wins, rely on the Gemini jockey; he is especially good on two-year-olds.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Special services are featured. You are appreciated by co-workers, associates who need your skills. Those who appeared indifferent will now take trouble to pay compliments. Reconciliation with family member is indicated. Make peace at home.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Accent creativity. Young persons figure prominently. Move with the times. Be flexible. Emotions require outlet. Express yourself. Let member of opposite sex know how you feel. Toss aside false pride. Specify requirements and don't be a victim of wishful thinking, romantic notions.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Full moon position now accentuates basic values, property, relationship with one who can enhance sense of security. Be sensible. Refuse to give up something for nothing. See persons, situations in light of reality. Get appraisal.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Lunar position stresses exchange of ideas. You are able to distribute, publish and advertise. You reach more persons. You are complimented as one you respect confides problem. Your advice is sought. Permit humanitarian instincts to surface.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Your special abilities will result in a jackpot. You gain, win, add to personal possessions. New contacts pay dividends. Your qualities of independence, originality prove valuable assets. You get break and your creativity carries you through to success. This can be quite a day!

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Emotional debris can be removed. Recover self-esteem. Assert yourself. Special offer is on agenda. One who handles legal affairs has your best interests at heart. You will be vindicated. Your vitality returns. You act in more definite manner and you feel good, too.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Area previously off limits will be open--step forward and cast off fears. Experiment. Ask questions. Answers are available and come from surprise sources. Sagittarius, Gemini individuals play important roles.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Affair of heart is featured. Emotions tend to push logic aside. Do some remodeling. Also, stop giving to one who returns nothing. Aquarius, Leo persons are featured. Another Scorpio makes unusual request. Take time before deciding one way or another.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Full moon at top part of your chart depicts chance to rise above circumstances. There will be opposition, but prestige results. Go to source. Deal with persons you respect. Don't fall into maze of red tape. Speak up and your voice will be heard.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Good lunar aspect now coincides with travel, publishing, communication. Family member deserves special consideration. Know it and do something about it. Make intelligent concession. You'll be happier as result.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Check financial resources of one who would be your "partner." Don't jump at first offer. Have confidence enough to know that you have something of value to contribute. Expect the same of others. Be sure that one who makes claims can back them--with more than talk.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Time can be used to advantage. Wait and observe. Your judgment, intuition may be slightly off target. It is best to delay, especially where legal ties are concerned. Capricorn, Cancer persons may be involved.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you may appear indecisive, but you are capable of organizing, of fighting when you feel the cause is worthwhile. You are not a naturally gregarious person. However, the firends you have are loyal. March and December are your key months of 1974. You are due for changes and, if single, marriage is on horizon.

Town, utility coordinator proposed in Montague

MONTAGUE — The town planning board has recommended the hiring of a full time coordinator to act as a liason between town government and Northeast Utilities (NU), which plans to build a $1.35 billion twin-reactor nuclear power plant here.

But the planning board member who proposed the idea, William J. Powers, says the coordinator should have his salary paid by the utility as part of their development costs, not by the town.

The Hartford-based utility is expected to file an initial application for twin 850,000 kilowatt boiling water reactors on 1,500 acres in Montague with the Atomic Energy Commission next month, according to spokesmen.

Meanwhile, the first hearing in the case of a 27-year-old Montague man charged with malicious destruction of property in connection with the toppling of Northeast's $50,000 weather tower on the nuclear site two weeks ago will be March 17 in Greenfield District Court.

Samuel Lovejoy, 27, a resident in a Montague literary commune and Wilbraham native plead innocent to the charge.

Liz Hart

Hoop's unsung heroine

By KATIE KING

If spending long afternoons in a kitchen, slicing nearly twelve dozen naval oranges into bite size pieces and placing approximately one-hundred and fifty Stella Dora cookies on plates is important to the success of a women's basketball squad, then Mary "Liz" Hart should receive this season's most valuable player award.

Although she hasn't scored a single basket, pulled down a single rebound, or ballhandled past a single opponent, Mary is the nucleus of the UMass women's basketball squad. She is their unsung hero — their manager, who works as hard behind the scenes as a forward does underneath the boards.

Managers are more times than not overlooked, hidden behind all those breathtaking plays of the team's superstars, and Mary is no exception. She is the "sucker", who does all the team's dirty work. But who else except a happy-go-lucky Phys. Ed. major would hold an outlook concerning managing such as "It's really a lot of fun—there are quite a few fringe benefits such as going out to eat at Valley's when the team is on the road."?

Besides handling oranges and cookies, Mary's dirty work includes a number of menial tasks that are literally a pain in the ass to a coach and the players. For example, no coach wants to send time filling water bottles, gathering towels, or running around WOPE looking for the lost air pump needed to fill all the old deflated basketballs. Mary gets the honors instead, but she doesn't mind one bit.

Nor does she mind away games, which prove to be the real testers of her ability. Not only is she responsible for holding every piece of jewelry and every set of car keys that her players own — there is no other place for these items, and who else but a good natured manager would be more than willing to help out? —but she must also record all the team's statistics. To compound matters, these stats must be turned into the coach at the end of each quarter to be used as coaching guidelines, and the team couldn't do without them.

"Sometimes I find myself fudging or trying desperately to get the statistics recorded as they occur. If you've ever attended a game, you'd know that things aren't exactly terribly organized," she remarked. Yet Mary always comes through, even in the most hectic games.

If being the team's manager is such a bummer, then why does Mary bother with it? The answer to that is pretty simple. She enjoys working with and around people, to the extent that during summer break she coaches a softball team. By managing a team, she can pick up the techniques of being a good coach and use them in her own work. Also, as a Phys. Ed. major she hopes to teach eventually, and what she learns from managing will greatly aid her.

Besides all her "noble reasons", Mary says, "I enjoy it very much, and it's just a lot of fun. Anyhow, I figure somebody has to be manager, and it might as well be me."

Women drub Rhody in hoop tournament opener

It was a happy night for the UMass women's basketball team in Brooklyn. Last night in the first game of the Regional Tournament they posted a score of 61-53 against the University of Rhode Island.

They jumped immediately into the lead and led at the end of the first quarter 19-11, the half, 34-20.

Jenny Edminster and Pat Glispin were the two high scorers and rebounders.

Jenny was returning to the line-up after a two-game absense. After missing games against Plymouth State College, Southern Connecticut, and Smith due to a bone stress fracture, Jenny came back in the clutch to sink 18 points, while Pat added 10.

The defense was in top form. They pressed well and forced Rhode Island into sloppy passes and hurried shots. Rhode Island also had more turnovers.

Coach Jane Farr was proud of her team. "We played very nicely today", she said. "I am looking forward now to playing Queens."

UMass will face a tough test today when they meet the no. 2 seeded team in the Tournament, Queens College, at 12 noon.

UMass' Lynch named ECAC weekly All-star

Senior forward Jim Lynch was named to the final edition of the weekly ECAC Division Two weekly All-East hockey team yesterday.

The Woburn native scored six points in two games last week which put him into a tie for the team scoring lead.

Other selections were: Tim O'Connell and Michel LeBeau (Vermont); Dick Lamby and Harry Lahey (Salem State), Bill Cantwell (Norwich) and Tom Kilduff (Merrimack).

All not golden for Pitino

With routs over Maine, Fordham and New Hampshire to close out the season, and as the fourth NIT in the last five years steadily approaches, what better time to look at the man who's been the floor leader of the last two teams to make the trip to New York. He's been here for four years and has been a starting guard for the past two...his name is Rick Pitino.

Pitino has one regret out of his four basketball years here at UMass. "I regret quitting the team my sophmore year...I quit because of the guys on the team, most of them were good guys off the court but on the court their attitude was rotten. They didn't like Leaman and they had young guys like me who didn't even know the coach, disliking him." When those players left, Rick came back. "I was the last guy on the team," says Pitino adding the Coach Leaman made things quite tough for him.

Despite the old adage that "statistics don't tell the story" people still look at the stats to judge a player's performance. When they do, they look at the 'assist' column to see how Rick did. "When Murph's shooting 22 times and Billy (Endicott(takes 12-14 and Trow likes to shoot and you gotta give Al (Skinner) the ball, somebody's got to be there to pass."

He wasn't always just a playmaker. Teammate and roomate Joe Artime saw Rick play in high school and says, "He was unbelieveable, he was an offensive machine, he could do anything he wanted to."

"I was heavily recruited by N. Carolina State (No. 1 in the nation) and Tennessee and others down South," says Pitino frankly, "but I chose to come to UMass because I knew I would play and because with Julius (Erving) I felt UMass baaketball was growing. They Julie quit and that was that."

Pitino, the "floor General" feels that money has hurt the program both in recruiting and in Scheduling. "Sure we can go down to West Virginia but they won't come here. If it weren't for coach Wilson (who does most of the recruiting) the program would be nothing."

However, money or no money,UMass awaits either an NCAA or NIT bid and Pitino would prefere the former, bigger tournament. "I'd like to go NCAA, hell it only takes one good game in the NCAA's to be looked at and maybe drafted. Like Al says, he'd rather get his head knocked off in the NCAA then play the NIT." Pitino added that this was in no way a slight on the NIT and if they didn't get an independant eastern regional berth in the NCAA, he'd like to play in the NIT's again. "Except for the top five in the nation we can beat anyone."

He speaks highly of his team and of their chances, but is more pessimistic about himself. "I'll try out for a couple of pro teams and after I get cut I'd like to coach." He mentioned the Milwaukee Bucks as a team that's promised him at least a tryout.

Pitino, who thought of transferring when he had his sophomore problems "would have been better off at a bigger school like N.C. State," says Artime who feels he would have developed better against better competition.

However, speaking for the whole UMass community, we're glad Rick came here.

"Under the lights"

By RUSS SMITH

When winter came, most sports minds turned to the indoor sports, like basketball and hockey. After all, not many normal students like to play tennis or even frisbee in the snow. Well, seeing how we have intramurals, those two sports will have to do in showing off your athletic ability. You could wrestle or compete in squash, but those are individual sports (you'd have no one to blame if you lost except yourself).

Wait! You didn't know there was such a thing as intramural ice hockey? Well, just to set you straight, there isn't, probably because there isn't a rink on campus. Nothing!

Look ahead to April. April gives us good times, and the promise of softball, soccer, horseshoes, tennis, badminton, and wrist wrestling. Out of those, you almost have to be good at one of them - or at least like to play. Wouldn't you like to hit your first college career homer? Or score the winning goal in your first soccer match since you left the minor leagues (high school)?

For those who participated in last years soggy, spring activities, it's a chance to prove that it was just the wet ground that made it impossible to catch up with those line drives, a chance to prove that your falling down wasn't because you were light on your feet, but rather the soft turf.

And the intramural department has even added a new sport for those of us who stay here on weekends: co-ed. softball! Otherwise known as one-pitch Softball. The games will be played on the intramural fields across from Boyden Gym. Why the name one-pitch? 'Cause that's all you'll get from the pitcher -one pitch - you either get a hit or you're out. Now, if you think that's different, get this: the pitcher is on the same team as you - in other words, you pitch to your own team, and the other team just waits. For more information, either drop by the i.m. office, or see the athletic director of your dorm.

According to Ted Schmitt, the Director of the Intramural program, we could also see the addition of team Handball if the facilities can be made available. Team handball, for those of us who didn't know it existed, is a combination ob basketball-soccer into one fast sport: Instead of kicking a ball into the soccer goal, you have to dribble this mini-soccer ball down court, can pass it around like a basketball, but must throw it into the goal. But, that's in the future. It would probably be played during the basketball season, because it is usually an indoor sport.

In any case, that's what's coming up after our spring vacation. So, don't forget your gloves or your soccer shoes.

And if you still want to hear about basketball, here: The Playoff for the Campus Championship begin next Wednesday and will continue for about a week. Last year's champ the Panthers ended the regular season 4-1 in the High-Low Rise League, with the Moore Bullets going undefeated 5-0. Bowling for the Campus Championship, it'll be Sigma Alpha against the Brooks Trouts..shooting for Campus Third in Ten Pin, Beta Chi vs. the Magicians from McNamara....

Gymnasts seek second in Eastern championship meet

By WALT POWERS

The most important half of the men's gymnastics schedule occurs this afternoon.

The Eastern League championships, part of a big three-day NCAA qualifying meet that opened yesterday at Cornell's Barton hall will take place this afternoon. A team gets two points for each Eastern opponent beaten in dual meet and championship comeptition, so this afternoon's meet amounts for half the season.

In this situation a team that hits well on one given afternoon will win everything, and this is where UMass stands to gain. It is concievable that the Minutemen could advance from their current fourth-place standing to second. The outcomes in two close losses to Temple and Southern Connecticut were determined by freak, unexpected breaks in key events, and if UMass can hit consistently, the results will be reversed.

The real Battle of the meet will be for runnerup honors, since nobody has shown the ability so far to beat meet favorite Penn State. State, led by all American Jim Kreust, has lost just once, 162-161 to Michigan, and are undefeated in Eastern League competition. Superb in All-around with Kreust, Wayne Chandler, and John Juliano. They boast awesome depth in every event, and have yet to feel the loss of Olympian Marshall Avener. They were runnerup in the Nation last year, and are almost a cinch to make the top five this year.

Led by all-around Bob Rice, Temple has the inside track on second place. They lost to Southern Connecticut early in the season but recently held Penn State to their closest victory margin of the season. They tied with Southern in dual-meet competition, and beat UMass by four points in Philadelphia. Southern Connecticut's margin against the Minutemen was a mere .15.

Southern Connecticut looked like they'd sneak away from the rest of the league at the start of the season, but a recent loss to Penn State snapped an eighteen meet winning streak. The defending College Division NCAA champions have, in 1972 Olympic Coach Abe Grossfeld, one of the best Coaches in the country and in Rich Onysko, Pete Kormann and Jay Whelan, one of the best all-around teams in the East. They lack depth, however, and the loss of Olympian John Crosby has hurt them.

UMass will be bucking a low seed in their battle for eastern honors. Because of their third place dual meet finish, they will be competing directly against the third and fourth place finishers. Navy and Springfield, and this will keep the scoring down. UMass' success will key on their consistency. With the exception of the Southern Connecticut meet, the Minutemen have yet to hit to their potential this season.

The key event for UMass and probably the entire meet will be the pommel horse. UMass has potentially the best sidehorse team in the East, but lapses on it were instrumental in losses to Penn State and Temple. In their best showing of the season on this tricky event, the sidehorse nearly pushed UMass to an upset of Southern Connecticut.

After UMass the ranks thin out. Last year's runnerup Navy is in the midst of a dissapointing season; the loss of All-American Doug Griffith should push them back to fourth. Springfield has a powerful rings team and little else; peg them for fifth. Army, Syracuse, Cornell and Pitt are really only in this for the experience.

The top University-division team in the Easterns will qualify for the NCAA Championships.

LAST CHANCE - Steve Scuderi, here on the parallel bars, closes out a long career on Saturday.

Marvin Barnes wins NCAA rebound title

NEW YORK (AP) — Barring a few major miracles, Larry Fogle of Canisius is the nation's major-college scoring champion for 1974, Marvin Barnes is the rebounding king and Rickey Medlock of Arkansas is the free-throw titlist.

But there's still a tight race going on for the "dead-eye" championship. Arizona sophomore Al Fleming, who has finished the season, and UCLA senior Bill Walton, with one game to go, are in an eyeball-to-eyeball tie in field goal percentage shooting.

Both have made exactly two-thirds of their shots, equalling the all-time record of .667 per cent set in 1967 by UCLA's Lew Alcindor and tied in 1972 by Kent Martens of Abilene Christian.

Walton's regular season ends Saturday night in the Pacific-8 Conference championship game against Southern California. He's got to hit better than two-thirds of his shots to break the Alcindor-Martens mark and clinch the field goal shooting title.

Walton is also on the verge of breaking Alcindor's career major-college field goal shooting record of .639 per cent. He's currently got a .651 mark and if UCLA once again makes it past Southern Cal and into the finals of the NCAA tournament-has to shoot at a .494 clip to surpass Alcindor. A year ago, Walton blistered the record books with an all-time high .763 in four NCAA playoff games.

Fogle owns a 33.4 average, well in front of Bruce King's 31.0 for Pan American. James Williams of Austin Peay is third at 27.5

Barnes is averaging 18.8 rebounds per game to 16.3 for runnerup Carlos McCullough of Pan American and 16.2 for Kent State's Brad Robinson.

"I couldn't have asked any more of them"—Jack Canniff

The Vermont story-spell it PRIDE

By BILL BALLOU

Steve Nims sat by himself in a corner of a Gutterson Field House locker room, sweat dripping off his hair and face.

"That's all she wrote," he mumbled to no one in particular.

"Nice game, Nimsie" someone said.

"Yah."

There were lots of "nice games," well-deserved "nice games", going around that UMass locker room, but very few meant much to the recipients.

CHICK RHEAULT
Set record

The Minutemen had just lost a semi-final game, 4-3 to Vermont, and for them the season was over. Most people hadn't expected them to get that far, but they did. Most people hadn't expected them to do that well against Vermont, but they did.

They had been accused in early and mid-season of having no heart, no guts, but they found them somewhere. They used them to get past Boston State after almost upsetting New Hampshire and Northeastern. They used them to almost take Vermont, and left them on the soft Burlington ice when something they couldn't fight, the clock, made them quit.

"They played with a lot of pride," said coach Jack Canniff. "I couldn't have asked any more of them."

They never led, but that pride kept Vermont from ever opening up more than a two-goal lead. Pride brought them back to within one with only 130 seconds left in the game. Pride made Brian Mulcahy take a Vermont shot in his gut in front of an open UMass net with only six seconds left in the game.

"I don't know what it is," said a Vermont fan after the game, "but UMass always gives up a hard time, no matter how good we're supposed to be and how bad they're supposed to be."

Canniff knows what it is.

What pride couldn't do, Chick Rheault almost did. Canniff had said for months, "Chick Rheault is one of the best around, if not the best." The rest of the Division laughed.

But there was no laughter in Burlington as Rheault stopped shot after shot, only a begrudging "that goalie's pretty good" from the fans. Coming from them, that borders on idolatry.

Beaten on a deflection, Rheault made a glove save on Willie MacKinnon that was physically impossible. It kept the score 1-0.

Beaten on Tim O'Connel's breakaway, Rheault stopped Bill Koch's 20-footer with a right pad save and tied the puck up. Koch stood in the slot, stunned.

Then Jim Lynch stole the puck at center ice and fed freshman Mike Merchant, who went in alone. What had threatened to be a rout was a one-goal game.

Koch took advantage of a UMass mistake in back of their own net to beat Rheault on the first shot of the third period. 3-1 and the Cats closed in for the kill.

But Jim Lyons and Billy Harris broke two-on-one into the Vermont zone and Harris' backhander off Lyons' slap shot made it 3-2. One goal again, an upset in sight.

58 seconds later it was MacKinnon, again thanks to a mistake in back of the UMass net, and again the Cats were up by two. That was it, that had to be it. Once again Vermont would make the opponent fold.

But Rheault broke a record for career saves, got hurt, stayed in and played in pain, and his mates kept going.

Two Vermont defensemen collided and John Muse went around them, found a perfect shot in a stick that hadn't seen too many most of the year, and it was one again.

It'll be one forever, and the 4-3 score on some ECAC guide will be all that's left come next November.

Then it will be time for new memories, which should be pleasant ones.

Muse, as he headed out of the locker room, had already started thinking.

"Wow," he said, "we went this far this season and we're only gonna lose two regulars. Pretty good, huh? You know, I'm already looking forward to next year."

And that's all she wrote.

"Finest team I've ever had"—Jack Leaman

Minutemen gunners gird for the NIT

By EARLE BARROLL

The New York Nets are interested in Al Skinner. In fact, there are a number of teams in both the NBA and ABA who have likewise shown some interest in number 30, or as his teammates call him "silk", as in smooth.

"He'll definitely be drafted, possibly in a high round," predicted Jack Leaman yesterday as his 21-4 cagers began NIT preparations for an opponent we'll deem brand X until Monday when the official pairings come out in New York.

"A lot of pro teams have talked to me about him," said Leaman. "The Nets, especially have an interest in him because of his background and the fact they've had success with another player from Massachusetts." That, of course, is Julius Erving.

But unlike Julius, who never lacked the motivation needed to "explore his abilities" as he put it, the one quality that Leaman sees hurting Skinner at the moment is motivation, period. "There is no doubt that Al has the innate ability to be a professional," said Leaman.

"Right now though he lacks the desire to make basketball number one with himself. I'll guarantee you that if he does want it bad enough he'll be a more than average player."

There is also the case of one Richard Pitino who's been mired in the cloud of obscurity that usually accompanies all UMass athletes, but who has been perhaps in the words of his coach, "the best guard in New England over the last half of the season."

That clearly explains why he was not picked for either the first or second teams in the all-Yankee Conference selections. "Rick has guarded more good guards to standoffs," said Leaman. Like: Kevin Stacom of Providence, Dennis "Sweet D" Duval of Syracuse, Jim Foster and Al Weston of UConn, etc.

Pitino, who has a chance of breaking the UMass single season assist record at the NIT, has expressed a desire to get at least a tryout from the pros. "I don't know if they'll take a 6' guard," questioned Leaman, "but someone would be smart to take him to camp and give him a look. Maybe he'll finally get the recognition he deserves at the NIT.

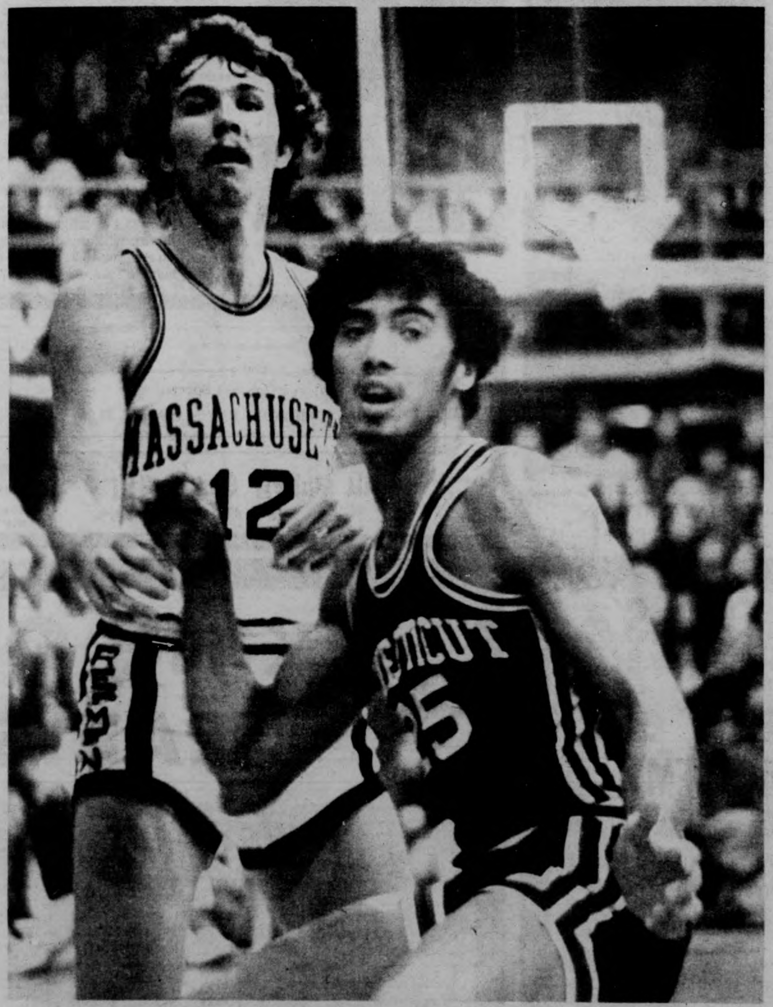
While Pitino's absence from the conference team and even that of poppin Peter Trow remains a mystery, UMass can still lay claim to three of the five places on the first team. Those being Skinner, who was also named the MVP of the league, John Murphy and Bill Endicott.

"These guys represent the finest team I've ever had at Massachusetts," said Leaman. "I have had a better individual in Julius Erving, but overall this team can do more things to hurt the opposition and produce wins. I expected them to be fine offensive club, but never did I envision the defensive job this team has done. With any luck they could 24-1 right now and on their way to the NCAA."

As it is they're only 21-4 and they're only going to the NIT. But, anyways the emphasis right now for Leaman and crew is to keep sharp. "We'll work on what we do best," said Leaman," and on e the pairings come out we'll get into specifics." One thing that Leaman is anticipating and has concerned his team with is the spectre of the dominating big man in the tournament.

"Our front line will be challenged with any team we'll face," he indicated. "It really hasn't been that big a factor for us as we've been out-sized up front with most teams we faced this year and have usually come out in front (number one in the country in rebound margin). We have been working though on some combination zones in case we run into a center we're having a hard time handling."

Okay, any predictions? "I think we have a chance to win the tournament. Sure, we won't be a favorite. But just give me foud games the way we played at Fordham and we just might be there in the end."



(Staff Photo-Emmett Schmarsow)

YOU AND ME IN THE NIT? The possibility of facing each other again in the NIT came as a real shock to UMass' Bill Endicott and UConn's Tony Hanson.

Tim Crouse: Man On The Bus

by Michael Kostek
and Frederic C. Weiss

Tim Crouse, author of the Boys on the Bus, the story of Press Corps' coverage of the 1972 Presidential race, is an up and coming journalist. With the publication of his first book, he has risen rather quickly from a rather obscure Rock writer for Rolling Stone magazine ("I was getting sort of tired of looking into stories like 'is Stephen Stills snorting cocaine', and that kind of junk") to a respected 'political' writer.

Any interview with Tim Crouse, Associate Editor of Rolling Stone and aide and abettor to Dr. Hunter S. Thompson's Fear And Loathing On The Campaign Trail '72 scheduled to start at 12 noon would certainly begin, if ever, at about five or six o'clock the next week, depending how long his hangover lasted. Anyone able to write feature stories for Rolling Stone about Sly Stone, and follow the price of Gonzo journalism, Hunter Thompson, around the country on that most brooding and cathartic of trips, the 1972 Presidential Election, had to be crazy, and had to have a lot better things to do than piddle around with a couple of college greenies. So when Crouse walked in at 11:58 after having already eaten in the Hatch, looking a polite, prepper-Harvarded-hipped understanding twenty-seven year old, it was somehow reassuring to see that the Truth hhd been in the hands of this slightly angry but responsible and erudite young man.

A few introductory queries as to how he could have possibly been early ("I hate people who are late."), and how he liked being on the college circuit ("It beats working.") left us with nowhere to go except the Top of the Campus for an excellent three and a half hour talk.

The reason for all this was Crouse's book, The Boys On The Bus, a frank, witty and honest description of the reporters who report our Presidential campaigns. Investigation in this area was certainly long-overdue, as those who script for the nation's newspapers certainly have a lot to do with this greatest of power-go-rounds. Unfortunately, The Boys On The Bus has been mishandled by Random House, who don't quite know how to handle it — serious, funny or subversive? As a result, sales have been bungled and a bit of the Truth has been lost.

In a Rolling Stone ad('It's not exactly the staff of life'), Tim Crouse is listed thusly: Associate Editor, Boston, ("As 'Associate Editor', I have no official duties."). Formerly editor, Harvard Crimson ("Everyone on the Crimson staff is called an 'editor'"); pop music critic, Boston Herald ("I didn't know anything about music, but the Herald's readership is mostly over 80, so no one cared."); Taught English for the Peace Corps in Oujda, Morocco ("I had to get out of the draft."). Claiming self-defense, he once hit Sly Stone in the face with a wet washcloth.

Our interview with Tim Crouse went smoothly; what started out as a rigid question and answer type of thing, soon "deteriorated" into a delightful conversation. Describing the reasons why he wrote the book, he went on, "Thompson resented the fact that they (The Press Corps) were treating him like shit! Both books started out as a sort of 'politics of vengeance'; in fact that is a motif of Thompson!" Yet while the project started as an act of revenge by an eccentric writer who felt that he was being persecuted by the press because of his style and publication (after all Thompson was the main political writer for Rolling Stone), Crouse soon found himself working alone on the book. "Hunter got tired of the whole thing, and started working on something else", he concluded with a grin.

His study of the Press Corps, left him with some definite conclusions: "Political journalism is like politics. Every four years you find yourself with a chance to become a 'winner'. You find that if you work hard, do a good job, and in some cases, 'kiss ass', you'll get a chance to cover a candidate. If that candidate wins, you've got a chance to go all the way. Therefore people want to stay with a 'winner'; something like that just has to affect your coverage of the news."

Yet despite this ironic twist to political coverage, this twist that encourages "pack journalism" ("people are afraid to break a big story, a 'controversial' story, because they feel they'll be on the outs and lose their chance to 'stay with a winner, so they stay with the pack'," he muses), Crouse does have a great deal of respect for most of the members of the press corps.

Crouse found that despite the fact that many of the reporters on the Press Bus were already established, they worked hard. Despite the pack journalism, the fear of chancing defeat, he found that covering a campaign was "Very hard work. Reporters have incredible drive, even the established writers as much now as ever! You have to almost go on a campaign to work on a good paper."

Five years coming out of Harvard, Crouse found himself riding, talking, drinking and observing things with established writers like David Broder, Jules Whitcover, Johnny Apple, the journalistic "heavies", and many other writers who were trying to "make it". Now because of the positive response to his book, Crouse's future looks very good. How does one go about "making it" in journalism? "The main thing is that you've just got to work. I had faith to feel that if you worked hard the breaks would come. You've got to esign yourself to three or four shit years ... before you get your break." For Crouse, the 1972 campaign was his break.

His remarks concerning the candidates, and politicos that he observed are as interesting as his material on the press corps.

McGovern — "After the Wisconsin primary, I was sure in my heart that he was going to win the nomination ... The reason that his campaign seemed to fall apart so badly is that there was a small amount of loyalty among his staff. McGovern allowed himself to be taken advantage of." He likes McGovern, but considers him to be a paradox. "He was naive in a lot of ways during the election. He is tough and vulnerable, but he is a politician.

Nixon — When pressed upon his opinion of Nixon's stability as a President and a man, he commented, "I think that Nixon is unstable. He is uninformed! You know, the way someone becomes a neurotic, is that the information being fed to him is faulty. That is the problem with Nixon, he was always getting faculty information from guys like (H.R.) Haldeman and (John) Ehrlichman."

Crouse expressed disappointment concerning the relationship between the Press Corps and their coverage of the Nixon campaign. "They (the Press) were blind to the fact

the rest of the CROUSE article that the Nixon men were thugs ... They were so willing to see this (i.e., a picture of a relaxed Ron Ziegler on a 'informal' pleasure cruise) that they weren't willing to see that they were thugs.'

"You know, when I was in Washington, Spiro Agnew was till around. And the standing cliche among the members of the Press Corps was; 'I don't agree with the guy, he's honest'. Well, he never struck me as an honest man. Despite all the things that he was saying, I never felt that they really took him seriously."

Crouse would like to see a new type of campaign coverage. He feels that reporters should go into detail concerning news events. If someone says something now, that clearly contradicts something they said a few weeks before, he feels that reports should "point this out". As of now, they don't because it is considered to be "too subjective".

As a prime example of the coverage he would like, he points out the problems of the Nixon-McGovern campaign. "McGovern was a victim of the system. It doesn't explain things, and tell just why something happened, or why he said this. McGovern got zapped because he told lies that were very checkable. Perhaps the pressure of a national campaign brought this on."

"However Nixon's lies were more subtle But if yoı explained the history of Nixon's ideas and record it is clear that he was a liar during the campaign. If you explained his movites ... it was clear that he was a pig! The press didn't take the time to do this, but they should have."

Asked what his gut reaction to 'The New Journalism" was, Tim replied, "It's a positive one, but with reservations. Most people working in this area are second-rate. Unless you get xceptionally perceptive and interesting peole like Norman Mailer and Thompson, you get a lot of dull, unresearched stuff that isn't going to convince or persuade anyone. I consider the best example of this in someone like Jimmy Breslin. I believe in more hard work, more researched and investigative reporting!"

He doesn't foresee any real change toward investigative reporting. "It will probably peak as a technique with the publication of Woodward and Bernstein's (the two main Washington Post diggers in uncovering Watergate) book later this year, nd as a fad; but will be on the decline by 1976, mainly because it's easier to do it the other way."

"Rolling Stone is good in that it will take chances other papers won't. However, things will never be the same, as the paper has gotten too big in the sense that, when I started, I figured I could write anything I wanted, as no one would read it anyway. That's not true now. But the paper will definitely be around for a while. In fact, it's scary how many people read it now, and take it completely seriously, especially some of Hunter's stuff. I remember him writing something quite obviously untrue; like when he reported that he and John Chancellor of NBC went tripping together. The Republican national paper picked that up and reported it a fact, and for quite a while Chancellor had a lot of explaining to do in New York."

Speaking of the Stone's increasing political coverage, Tim replied that "Jann Wenner (founder and Editor) is the paper. A lot of us put pressure on him to change the paper's policy and change our musical assignments. Wenner suffers from the Westerner's inferiority complex towards the East, and this was the way to be respected, by writing about powerful people. Rolling Stone does a lot of boring, silly things, but I feel we've also done a lot of good things."

I contrived to get assigned with Hunter in New Hampshire. They told me to stay out of his way, but the first night t the motel in Durham he came down and pounded on my door at about four in the morning. From then on we got along well. It turned out that Hunter needed an assistant on the trail, and I was glad to fill that role. The first time I had anything political published was one week that Hunter couldn't meet the deadline, and we fed something I was working on in to them

What about the infamous Mr. Thompson? What kind of person is this crazed legend?

"There is a lot of Hunter in his writing. I'd say about 50 per cent of it is really him, his own personality. His persona that he's developed in his writing is quite ccurate. He is very self-destructive; he starts drinking at 7:30 in the morning, but while you always will see him with a drink in his hand, he never gets drunk, unless he's very tired, having been up for four days or something like that. So he is always pretty lucid and impressive, appearing very intelligent. He looks like a banker, and is really very gentle, patient and generous. He is always involved with lawsuits and fights with publishers, as he will avoid writing until bsolutely necessary.

"For a while there he was distracted by the cult following his writing fostered, and his writing suffered, but he's gotten over that. Hunter's great, if you agree with him from the start, as he's not really one for facts and hard investigative reporting. He has an uncannily-correct gut reaction to things, but you have to believe with him. Most of his writings, such as Fear And Loathing In Las Vegas, is fantasy, based on some fact. For example, if he writes 'Crouse and I sit in his Toyota, heavily smoking hash and having some great visions.', what's really occurring is that Hunter and I are sitting in the Toyota.

"Most people don't have as much sould as Hunter. I know that sounds extremely condescending, but it's true. Most reporters get their personality beat out of them very quickly, and this becomes a problem on the Campaign Trail, as without the candidate, the writers have no identity, so they necessarily become parasites. Hunter is really unique. He's a combination of all the things that have happened to him — he was in jail as a kid, he was Southern American Correspondent for the National Observer, he was beaten up by the Hells Angels, and in Chicago in '68. He's crazy, no doubt about it. Inside, he's a frustrated politician. In twenty years he'll be writing novels."

"It's really hard to say how much of the 'off the record' confidences he keeps. I know it's not true, unlike he professed, that he reported everything, with no holds barred, there are many things that he doesn't even tell me!"

While he admires Thompson's style, he feels that his future will be more involved in investigative reporting. Having already taken on the rigors of the campaign trail; done features on more than one prominent Senator; and done an indepth story on the Watergate Senatorial Committee; his next rask might be an indepth study of the U.S. Supreme Court. One this is clear; he will be writing. After all, there aren't enough writers to do the investigative reporting that must be done. Crouse wants to be one of thooe who will tell the stories that must be told.

Proctor & Bergman — Another Little Taste

Maybe you remember: last week we peregrinated with Firesign Theater's Proctor & Bergman. Well, we weren't done then and we're not done this week, but read on. . .

Berg.: Let me tell them about The Fuse of Doom. The Fuse of Doom was a serial cliff-hanger, as Phil said — Clifford Irving Hanger, actually, but they didn't hang him, they let him go. He came out of jail and he said — this is true. In Switzerland, Clifford Irving came out of jail, and they asked him, 'have you learned your lesson Mr. Irving?', and he said, 'my name is not Irving, it's Hughes.' And there was a pause and then they put him right back in. Incredible.

Proc.: And then he bought the prison.

Berg.: Yeah, 'cause he signed out his valuables, Howard Hughes, when they put him right back in, and he bought the prison, and he's living there right now with Bernie Kornfeld.

The Fuse of Doom was performed at The Ash Grove in '68 and we did two chapters: we did chapter 1 and chapter 7, io give you an idea. It's the story of Frank Acme, here. . .

Proc.: Acne.

Berg.: Acne, now played by Phil Austin on the album, but originated by Phil Proctor. And his father, Jonas Acne, myself, and Charles Foster Dudley, the newspaper guy, and the famous inventor, Doctor Emmanuel Archetype. And we told the story of this very wealthy family with this son who flies and everything like that, and the tube gets stolen and the inventor is left with a fuse in his mouth and when they pull the fuse out he runs down and they can't tell what. . .

Proc.: And Benway, the servant, was a spy, was obviously a spy. . .

Berg.: "Draw the curtains, Benway", and so he takes out a pen. . .

Below The Salt has been the kind of magazine that would print peculiar work. We pledge to uphold this tradition, but can't promise everybody's peculiar work will fit. Yours must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces to the line. The deadline for each Thursday's edition is noon the previous Tuesday; but you can write to us anytime.

Politics

I. Feedback (or, how to react and win friends)

I'm overwhelmed. Honestly. I haven't received this much notice for something I've had the privilege of printing in a very long time.

First, it's time to vitrify the rock — clarify the focus, if you will.

Page with a Porpoise originated in my mind from my own involvement with Student Government. I formed Concert Committee, along with Joe Tropiano and Elliot Sherman, three years ago. Big deal — I got over it fast, and my ego wasn't seriously damaged by any criticism I received. As Jim Lindsey now knows, I'm not an irresponsible idiot — as a matter of fact, both Bob McDonald and Jim Lindsey did what I had intended from the beginning — THEY ACTUALLY ASKED PEOPLE TO COME DOWN TO THE OFFICE AND SEE WHAT THEY WERE DOING! This reaction, and nothing more, is all I ask for.

As for Noel Conley's part in this, I'm doubly gratified that Noel came up to us, and explained his part in the system, and how he viewed it. I will print anything that Noel submits to me, since he has shown himself to be active and concerned with the direction of events coming from the Campus Center. I haven't seen such interest in a long time, and I'm overwhelmed when I do encounter it. This is the real thing:

4. Finance Committee
February 26, 1974

Under the discussion of Program Council Budget: there has been a change in the make up of Program Council. A new committee has been formed which will oversee PC, make recommendations approve functions and oversee financing. The committee structure will remain the same and no previously planned functions are cancelled."

Those are the facts, folks — okay? I don't care if you dislike my writing style — I care that people can still respond to a call for action.

I would like to encourage everyone to check out Program Council, Campus Center Board of Governors, and the Collegian itself. There will be a meeting of the Campus Center Board of Governors to discuss the Rathskellar on Monday, March 11 at 3 p.m. in Campus Center 802. Interested students are invited to come. Now, you might want to arm yourselves with this info. No hard feelings? If there are, let us KNOW.

II. The Rathskellar Tapes
by Steve Tetreault

Southwest students want a Rathskellar in Southwest. The Southwest Assembly wants a Rathskellar in Southwest. The Campus Center wants a Rathskellar in Southwest.

Unfortunately, life is not that simple.

First of all, the word "Rathskellar" originates from Germany, where it signified the cellar of a city building, often used as a beer hall. The Campus Center and the Southwest Assembly (Southwest's student government) have been in "negotiations" for such a Rathskellar, which would be located in Hampden Commons. At present both sides are in disagreement over several involved issues. Like control over the operations, the distribution of monies, the atmosphere and decor of the nitespot. Little things.

Late last semester, John Corker, Campus Center Director, suggested that the Food Services Division of the Campus Center open up a drinking operation in Southwest.

Corker, Jim Lindsey, Chairman of the CC Board of Directors, and Larry St. Cyr, Southwest Assembly President, discussed the suggestion over intercession, and arrived at what the Campus Center representatives felt was an almost complete agreement. Under these terms, Southwest would receive 25 per cent share of a $15,000 entertainment budget to be used within Hampden for renovations, resource center equipment, and the like. They would also name several students to act as an "Advisory Board" to the CC in regards to the operation.

St. Cyr slept on the proposal, and had a change of mind. "I don't think I can buy what they're offering. Advisory boards' have reputations of being pushed aside and not really consulted in many matters," he said.

What does Southwest want? Nobody really knows. "The issue of governance and control hasn't really been defined yet," says St. Cyr. "As for the matter of money, well, it varies from day to day. The Campus Center has offered us so much, but I feel that we could — and should — get more."

This holdout attitude is not shared, however, by everyone in the Southwest Assembly. Larry Sinewitz, a member, admits, "I don't care about the money. The Campus Center was pretty fair to make an offer. I'd be satisfied if we didn't make a penny off the deal, as long as we got the place."

But if Southwest doesn't know what it wants, it knows what they don't want. "We don't want another Bluewall down here," said St. Cyr. Maureen Mitchell, another member of the Assembly, added, "What goes on at the Bluewall is very similar to what goes on at a typical Southwest party. If the Campus Center opened a Bluewall in Hampden, then the problems of drunkenness and rowdiness would only increase."

The considered space in the building is not very large, about 150 capacity, and considering acoustics, not more than one or two amplified instruments should be allowed. Apparently the area is suited for a more intimate atmosphere than the Bluewall.

DAILY
POOP
S'west Wants, CC No Give

Well, What Do You Know

This would mean that whoever set up an operation in the area would have to spend some money to renovate and install proper decor. The Campus Center, in its original proposal, had laid aside about $2500 for basic renovations, and an additional $18,000 to transport and install supplies and equipment. Here is where some Southwest Assembly members become wary. They point out that the area, which is located in the basement, already contains a counter and is equipped with some furniture. The room was used periodically during the fall to feed the football team. "All they have to do is move their kegs in, and they can set up shop. For all we know, they might slough off when it comes to really fixing up the place. Personally, I wouldn't trust them as far as I would throw them," said one member.

Meanwhile, the people in the Campus Center look at the situation from a different perspective. This is not an emotional venture. "It's a purely business venture," began Jim Lindsey. "Southwest wants things that we can't give them. They want control over the operation. At present, they have a representative on the Campus Center Board of Governors (Noel Conley). We did offer them an advisory voice in parts of the operation. We offered them a certain percentage of the entertainment budget. They want a bigger share of the profits, but sometimes I wonder if they'd be willing to share in any possible losses." Lindsey later stated that estimated net profit for a Rathskeller in Southwest could come to about $40,000 per year.

Both Lindsey and John Corker feel that they are acting in the best interest of the students. They cite that they are willing to pay $25,000 yearly rent to University Food Services for Hampden. This money could go into reducing meal ticket prices. They are also willing to staff the Rathskellar with Southwest students.

But Lindsey will still hold out on the big issue of giving control. "Its the University's, and basically the students' money that we're playing with, and I think it could be foolish to throw a bunch of it into Southwest without having some say about where it goes. As far as I know, Southwest might decide to hire bartenders for the place at $4 per hour. We'll have to negotiate more."

Corker understands Southwest's concerns. "We certainly aren't going to put something into Hampden that the students of Southwest don't want. We have proposed to sell only beer and wine in the Rathskellar, but no matter what sort of decor you install, people are still going to get drunk."

And if things weren't complicated enough, Whitmore is also involved. Vice Chancellor Gage was requested by the Campus Center to study and comment on certain policy suggestions, such as the effect an alcoholic-beverage outlet would have on an area. "There are still questions to be answered," said Corker. "For example, if Southwest receives a Rathskellar, how soon will it be before other areas ask for one?"

At this writing, the Southwest Assembly and the Campus Center have not met in two weeks, and negotiations are at a stand still.

"If we haven't got this thing resolved by April 1st, it will be very difficult to get everything into Hampden by September," said Corker. According to Corker and Lindsey, the Campus Center wouldn't cry if the project was abandoned.

Lindsey takes more of a "take-it-or-leave-it" stance. "I'd like to get this thing over with one way or the other. We either open or we don't. We can be spending our time and money on other things. It's up to Southwest."

St. Cyr apparently considers these statements as bluffs. He stated that the Southwest representative on the CC Board, Conley, hasn't been fully brought into discussions on the matter. He also claims to have received an "anxious" call from the Vice-Chancellor Campion inquiring about the project. He also feels that Whitmore's involvement in the project indicates that both sides will be a little less hasty in dropping the whole thing.

"Jim Lindsey has also threatened to call a student referendum in Southwest on the matter," said St. Cyr. A student vote would almost certainly be overwhelmingly in favor of the Rathskellar, thereby putting pressure on their representatives in the Southwest Assembly to accept any offer from the Campus Center.

Getting the Rathskellar would be taking big steps towards the completion of Hampden as a student center. "Hampden doesn't have a Rathskellar now, and its surviving," said Bob Antil, Southwest Social Activities Coordinator, who is responsible for booking dates at Hampden, "but having it would be nice." Larry Sinewitz feels that Hampden will be stepping backwards if it loses a nitespot. "We've done lots of work to get students more involved in the place. It would be a disappointment if we lost it now.

The Campus Center feels that it has been very generous in the matter and finds it hard to believe they could be cast as villians. Indeed, some observers feel that the stubbornness of Southwest will prove to be its undoing. They don't seem to know what and how much they want out of a Rathskellar deal. Chances are as good as not that the Rathskellar project will be put off another semester.

"That would be a shame," stated one resident. "A place like that would go a long way to making Southwest a place to live instead of just a place to sleep."

If The Space Fits . . . If The Space Fits . . .

Together

No longer in virginal body bound,
Delighting now in new freedom found.
Giving, taking, knowing as such,
Sharing love; touching in such.
The joining of bodies in loving embrace,
Merging of minds that interlace
Our hearts and souls as one,
Never again to be alone.
And the time shall come some day,
Unto Cerridwen and Adonais
And the golden child of the morning,
We shall go together, willing.

The Setting

are we ready for the day
He walks away with His soiled coat over His shoulder stealing light as He hides behind the hills burning His disgust in the sky and this time He promises to never return in His fresh pressed pants and starched white shirt will we cry when He's finally gone or why not celebrate and go barring and whoring and shoot some niggers from our trucks and toast the final shot at the Bastard we'll get the dogs and run them dead chasing west and to hell with Him
we were dying anyway.

Real Stuff And Desperate Brilliance

by Mike Kostek

Rock N Roll Animal
Lou Reed
(RCA APL1-0472) time 40:38

Lou's taken a dramatic swerve from the big Berlin production, but one thing we can always count on Lou for is dramatic swerves away from what he did before. This Animal's captured live, with a slooped-up unnamed band bombing out some seventies hot stuff behind him, and it all sounds fine.

This seems like a compendium updating of Reed's biggest Velvet Underaound days with one particular Berlin gut-grabber, "Lady Day", poked in. Even though more than a bit of the band's playing is specious and working in over used forms, Rock N Roll Animal breathes a lot of fire, mainly due to the fact that Reed's big Underground days were as big as they come.

"Intro" is a nice bit of opening instrumental bombast, with swirling chords rising and teasing. Out comes the Animal, and the New York crowd goes mad. Lou schoicks marvelously stumblebum through "Sweet Jane", with the band giving us plenty of those rolling tree trunk chords, and we reach the squalid-splendid anchor of side one, a 13:11 "Heroin". It's amazing to reflect that this song is almost ten years old ("I have made a very big decision") and is true ("I'm going to try to nullify my life") and fresher ("cause when the blood begins to flow") than ever ("and it shoots up the dropper's neck").

The rush chords are not teenage aimless energy scrabbles of squalling noise ("and I'm closing in on death"), as in the original ("you can't help me, all you guys"), but now are triumphant chords that signal a more mature euphoria ("and all you girls with your pretty talk").

Lou Reed the Animal.

The first part of the song climaxes with "you can all go take a fuckin' walk", a great line, a great moment. This "Heroin" swings not only differently in the speed runs, but also in the moments of inbetweenness ("Heroin, be the death of me"). Reed's shooting along, confident in his game ("Her-ROW-In, it's my wife, and it's my life"). Strong ("'cause a mainer"). The concentration of surity is almost total ("to my brain"), and we're watching a true heroin animal whose grip on his life is firm, bold and unshakable until "leads to a center in my head". "Head" is pronounced like he's just taken a spear in the side, and he cracks like a wounded child, helpless victim, heroin addict. We get the animal back a bit ("and then I'm better off than dead") rolling the words once again, but not totally recovered from that inevitable unravelling moment of vulnerability and weakness.

The song, the drug, the world remain problems. We all want to get away from "the politicians makin' busy sounds-and all the dead bodies piled up in mounds", and heroin certainly does it, but there always will be that "center in my head" that lays us open, and out.

Side two unfolds with "White Light-White Heat", not a great song, but the suitable perverse lyrics are always a treat. "Lady Day" has more rough edges than the Berlin version, but is wilder, more out of control here, and more chilling in a lot of ways. The band plays it like Alice Cooper whooping into a Procol Harum song.

The classic "Rock & Roll" closes it up in excellent, driving style, as a final benediction and reminder that it's still fun, and "her life was saved by rock & roll".

What's this all for? The Velvets did have 'Golden Archive Series' collections and The Velvet Underground featuring Lou Reed best of albums released by MGM, but nobody noticed. This stuff, now more than ever, kills the Mott-T. Rex-NY Dulls 'gutter-glitter rock' dead, as all these groups typify is a lot of empty posturizing as they never actually step off the curb into the gutter, where so much of this 'life' takes place. Lou Reed has always carried us (with the empty exception of Transformer) right into the Real Stuff, replete with dangerous, despicable characters that make us cringe. Rock N Roll Animal, besides getting these classics into the new Seventies audience, gives them a fresh and revitalizing turn, as the band (drums, two guitars, bass, organ) is recorded unusually well for a live record. This is desperate brilliance I love being trapped with.

Dog Blow Over The Radio

INTRODUCING THE ELEVENTH HOUSE WITH LARRY CORYELL
(Vanguard VSD 79342)

This album, delayed a couple of months by the vinyl shortage, will undoubtedly contain a few surprises for anybody who heard Coryell and The Eleventh House at Amherst College's Alumni Gymnasium last December or at the Rusty Nail three weeks ago. It's also full of goodies for the "novice" listener.

The songs, although they sound melodically like the tunes you may remember from these concerts, just don't seem to FEEL the same. I don't mean that that's not good. On the contrary, I find it a welcome relief from the needlessly loud (even painfully loud) ventures the group has offered lately.

As a result of this recording, the group's jazz sound has become "intimate" (as jazz probably should be), instead of bumptious. The synthesizer is not overpowering, the trumpet sounds like a trumpet instead of a competing synthesizer, and there's a balance of each instrument.

Trumpet man Randy Brecker stands out as star soloist, particularly on "Yin" and "Low-Lee-Tah", where a beautiful trumpet solo unfolds crisply and logically.

As for guitarist Larry Coryell's solo work with the band, this album stands as final, vinyl evidence that "Coryell-fanatics" ought not to fall down on their knees in praise of him as the new "Guitar-God". It's all been done before him (and better). However, on "Gratitude", an unaccompanied guitar solo, one can hear the reason why Coryell at least deserves respect. I wish he'd play in a way that would make me respect him more often, though.

Mike Mandel's contributions on piano and Arp Synthesizer are faultless as usual, although he does seem to be a little subdued on this album. On a segment of "Yin", where synthesizer, trumpet, and guitar exchange comments, Mandel gets a chance to put together some nice ideas.

It's the dynamic duo of Alphonse Mouzon (drums) and Danny Trifan (bass) that keeps this album cooking, however. The drive, the interplay, the syncopation, the precision are all there, especially on "Yin", "Right On Y'All" (written by Mouzon), and "Adam Smasher".

"Introducing The Eleventh House" is a fine album in all respects ... get into it.

ATMOSPHERES-CLIVE STEVENS
(Capitol ST-11263)

Five years ago this album would have loosened my earwax. Being a recent release however, it suffers by comparison with others who've done the same thing and better for years, notably Mahavishnu, Coryell, Corea, etc. And with most of the big names giving up composition to boogie their souls away, there's no room for an unknown who is merely a stylistic echo — close but no banana.

WHY QUIT WHEN YOU'RE LOSING COWBOY (Capricorn 2CX 0121)

In recent years, Macon, Georgia has become one of the country's most prolific spawning grounds for new white rock bands. Over the years, several of these groups have been drawn into a loosely-knit family with ties to Macon's own Capricorn Records and engineers-producers Tom Dowd and Johnny Sandlin. The head of the household, of course, is the Allman Brothers Band whose superb fusion of rock, blues and more recently, country, has made them America's premier rock band. The most recent addition to the family, the Marshall Tucker Band, recently received Rolling Stone's nomination as one of the five best acts to debut in 1973.

Lost in the shuffle somewhere was Cowboy — a six-man country-rock band whose only two albums, Reach for the Sky (vintage 1970) and Five'll Getcha Ten (vintage 1971) have been re-released as a two-record set titled (appropriately enough) Why Quit When You're Losing.

Five is unquestionably the better of the two albums. Reach for the Sky (Record One) has a rough, unfinished quality that was obviously, at the time, what Cowboy was after. The backwoods humor on several cuts ("Amelia's Earache," "Pick Your Nose," and "Everything Here") is so overdone that its taste permeates the whole album, lessening the impact of the seriously performed numbers — a number of which, particularly Scott Boyer's "It's Time" and the harder rocking "Rip and Snort," are nearly as good as the best the band had to offer on Five'll Getcha Ten.

There are no lapses into sheer silliness on Five. The only cut with a touch of outright humor is "Shoestrings". Things were frequently disjointed on Reach for the Sky, but here everything meshes perfectly. The harmonies are tight, the performances on guitar, piano and drums reserved but impressive, and the melodies imaginative and memorable. It's laid-back country-rock as it should be played.

Stand-out cuts include "The Wonder," "Lookin' For You," "All My Friends," and "What I Want is You." The only contribution by a writer outside the group, "The Wonder", is one of the album's most moving songs. Composer John McKenze mourns the loss of common feeling among the young people of the '70's: "Oh where is the wonder that could weave us all together—I hope it's not gone forever."

The similarity between "Lookin' For You" by Scott Boyer and "What I Want is You" by Pete Kowalke goes beyond the titles. Each closes a side of the album and both feature extended instrumental fade-outs that are flowing and ethereal.

Boyer's "All My Friends" is his most impressive song in all respects. It is a beautiful synthesis of lonesome country and soft rock laments, and his work on violin coupled with sideman Chuck Leavell's (now with the Allmans) delicate piano adds conviction to the already stirring vocals.

An historical note: Duane Allman plays slide guitar on "Please Be With Me". It turned out to be his last studio performance.

Rumor has it that Cowboy has long since disbanded, but Capricorn is giving those who missed them the first time around one last chance to catch onto the music of another fine Macon band. There's something here you just might regret missing.

BOZ SCAGGS SLOW DANCER

SLOW DANCER — BOZ SCAGGS
(Columbia KC 32760) time 36:56

If a soulful white man could push his way onto Motown's soulmill, would you listen? If you would, then Slow Dancer will be a beautiful delight, for Box Scaggs has made one of the finest white soul records ever.

It's really quite amazing how well Boz has moved in different musical areas. From his soft-hard rock days with Steve Miller ("Baby's Callin' Me Home", "Overdrive"), his bluesy first solo album ("Loan Me A Dime") Boz Scaggs, his quiet, sambaesque Moments to the big banded horns on Boz Scaggs & Band, he's been able to move right in and do justice to himself and the music. Here he's assuming all the forms, the tricks, the well-known and well-used musical devices that The Temptations, Four Tops et al. have in the past, and Scaggs has made a platter that truly works. The first two times I played the record I was so impressed and pleased with the songs that I thought Boz had picked out a lot of his obscure old soul favorites to redo here, but a check of the label revealed one good old Allen Toussaint tune, "Hercules" and nine new W.R. Scaggs or Johnny Bristol (the producer) songs.

Reservation Time: This is still sitting a bit uneasily with me, because Boz has made another 'nice album' that creates little, borrows a lot and winds up as an interesting synthesis. If you plugged Al Green or The Spinners into these arrangements, you wouldn't know. By putting himself, even as fully as he does, into all these other forms, Boz will make a lot of fine albums, but won't show us anything except: (1) how fine a music mimic he is (got to have soul to mimic well what Boz mimics) and (2) how good the music he's working in really is.

Celebration Time: The man's got taste, and some of the singing he does on here is top stuff. On "Angel Lady (Came Just In Time)" he gives us an earful of heart, and he and his chorus combine on "Pain Of Love" in a totality of sound that's a wonder, as it neither syrups nor grates, but dances lightly 'under the diamond sky with one hand wavin' free'.

Slow Dancer might just be, if you've always been put off by soul, an excellent entry into this sweet black world of feeling and taste. Boz's own musical identity, however, remains that of a sprightly chamelion. A-

CHUNKY, NOVI & ERNIE
(Reprise MS 2146) time 40:23

A delicate dance of John Cale's elegant rock mixed with Zappa-ed munchkin attitudes and Dan Hicks-Hot Licks violin-choral sweetness. Too sweet, to be sure, for some, but those in tune might well swoon. B

IN CONCERT
EUBIE BLAKE
DICKINSON LOUNGE
ORCHARD HILL
3-04-74

The Orchard Hill Concert Series got off to a great start last Monday night with a concert by one of the all time great pianists of "ragtime music", 91 year old Eubie Blake. Judging from the introduction, Mr. Blake's career is an immense one, with many, many contributions spanning nearly a century.

Dickinson Lounge was overflowing with people, with some standing outside. Considering the type of music being played, the audience was very enthusiastic. Both sets spotlighted Mr. Blake's immaculate playing abilities. In all, the evening was one well spent and Mr. Blake's return to the UMASS campus couldn't be any sooner as far as this reporter goes.

Bop Comes Back-The Voice As Instrument

by John Cahill

"My Analyst Told Me...."
"Some folks say that bop is dead;
But that cat done lost his head;
Tell that square he been misled,
Cause everybody's bopping." — Jon Hendricks

The recent revival of bebop songs like "Twisted" (Bette Midler and Joni Mitchell) and "Cloudburst" (the Pointer Sisters and Barry Manilow), plus the overall nostalgia binge that has seized the country has led this writer to believe that the listening public will soon discover the influential and musically intriguing bop singing heritage.

The definition of bop or scat singing is using one's voice as a jazz instrument, mimicking, say, a saxophone solo by fitting either lyrics or nonsense syllables to the improvised melody. The supposed "discoverer" of this school of singing was Louis Armstrong who accidentally dropped his music sheet at an early recording session and had to ad-lib sounds such as "Scah be da loo be dah be bop."

The leader of the bebop revolution in jazz, Dizzy Gillespie was also a pioneer bop singer. His inexhaustible musical ideas shine out on such classic vocal numbers as "Salted Peanuts", "Oop Pop Ada", and the famous duet with Kenny Hagood on "Ool Ya Koo".

The relatively new "vocalese" style demanded a strong malleable voice with a good range, a wide knowledge of music, and very speedy lyric articulation. Singers such as Joe Carroll, Eddie Jefferson, the exuberant Babs Gonzalez and Slim ("Flat Foot Floogie") Gaillard mastered this style in the late 40's.

Annie Ross, an English singer - actress, became a prolific bop singer. Her voice was no less than incredible in its range and strength, and allowed her to sing passages that no other vocalists could touch. Imagine a voice singing as high as Maynard Ferguson's stratospheric trumpet and you have an idea of Annie Ross's talent. In the early 50's, she put a set of mad lyrics to the popular tune "Twisted" by tenor saxophonist Wardell Gray and created an enduring hit.

In the late 1950's, Annie Ross, Jon Hendricks and Dave Lambert came together to form the landmark vocal trio known as Lambert, Hendricks and Ross. After an excellent, but quite unavailable session on the World Pacific label, they recorded their famous Columbia album, The Hottest New Group in Jazz (now re-released).

LAMBERT, HENDRICKS, & ROSS!

The album includes the trio version of "Twisted", as well as the machine gun fast "Everybody's Boppin" and "Cloudburst." Jon Hendricks, by that time a well known jazz man, sings the swinging solo on "Cloudburst" at such an accelerated tempo that you will be amazed that a human voice can sing lyrics so quickly.

The defunct Double Six of Paris expanded upon the number of vocalists in a group, and often sang difficult big band arrangements, each member singing the part for a different instrument. The Swingle Singers still perform and have enlarged the scope of bop singing by using its methods to interpret classical works, notably those of J. S. Bach.

Vocalist Clarence Beeks, known as King Pleasure, wrote and sang the memorable lyrics to two classic alto sax improvisations: James Moody's "Moody's Mood For Love" and Charlie Parker's tragic "Parker's Mood". Most King Pleasure albums are still available on Prestige Records.

Betty Carter, a true jazz singer, has a distinct style somewhere between Billie Holiday and bebop and beyond. Ella Fitz and Sarah Vaughan have been institutions in the jazz and pop world for some time and rightly so.

Today most of the old singers are gone: Dave Lambert is dead, Annie Ross has lost her voice, King Pleasure and many others have disappeared and are only remembered through the re-release of their albums. The bop tradition and its influence live on, however. The words to "Twisted" are now on many people's lips, the Pointer Sisters have made "Cloudburst" their own, and Bette Midler (as well as others) seems to be going deeper and deeper into the past. In fact, she interpolates Lester Young's salute to radio man Symphony Sid Torin, "Jumping With My Boy Sid in the City", "Mr. President of The D. J. Committee", in her version of "In The Mood."

Though more of a "music singer" than a jazz singer, the increasingly popular Cleo Laine from England is astounding everyone with her voice, said to be one of the best in the world, even over Yma Sumac. She and her husband, saxophonist-bandleader Johnny Dankworth, put together a strange, but beautiful album of Shakespeare's sonnets put to music a few years ago. Also try to check out her Grammy winning I Am a Song on RCA.

Leon Thomas, renowned for his "jazz" yodel, and his strong sense of Third World Tradition, is still on the scene, trying and succeeding in changing the role of the vocalist. He has worked with a wide variety of musicians including Count Basie, Rahsaan Roland Kirk, and Santana as well as having recorded prolifically with Pharoah Sanders and on his own.

Finally, some words must necessarily be said about the rapidly rising Pointer Sisters. Their first album on Blue Thumb was fine and promised something unusual and unusually good in the all too-typical pop music of today. Their just released second album more than fulfills that promise. Their agile voices sound improved, the back-up musicians, including Herbie Hancock, are impeccable, and the material is well-chosen. The Pointer's version of John Birks Gillespie's "Salt peanuts" knocked me out, more so than anything they've ever done. Their music is not an approximation of old bebop licks, it is latter day bop with all the quality inherent in that style.

Subtly, the bebop singer legacy has become an important root of today's vocal music.

Esoteric Innovations in The "Scat" Form

If one wishes to do a general and comprehensive outline of the form and the way it developed, one has to investigate the new uses of voice as expressed in the late sixties. Robert Wyatt of Soft Machine and Matching Mole (he has one incredible solo album available as a British import — End of An Ear on CBS-Britain) and has taken advantage of the truly incredible "jazz" and avant garde "classical" knowledge he possesses, and turned it into duo and trio effects with the aid of tape machines and echoplex devices.

Two other Englishmen, Roger Chapman and Vivian Stanshall, formerly of Family and the Bonzo Dog (Doo-dah) Band, have taken approaches to voice improvising which are truly astounding. Chapman's vocal dexterity is amazing, and once you get through the goatlike quality of his voice (tremolo and vibrato) you have a beautiful sound instrument. Stanshall works in a Dada-ist format, reshaping words and rounding his voice in order to imitate anybody conceivable. An example of his tonality can be heard very easily on the end of side one of Mike Oldfield's Tubular Bells. Not his best, but a good "ready made". (Marcel Duchamp inventions).

On the 'free' "jazz" scene we have Julie Driscoll's saxophone-voice duets with Trevor Watts on the Spontaneous Music Ensemble LP Birds of a Feather, as the result of interpretations of innovator Albert Ayler's work. Jeanne Lee has also been doing some amazing things with Anthony Braxton and Marion Brown. Yoko Ono should count too, possessing the ability to stretch and shape notes over considerable times; and putting it in a new (to western ears) framework.

Need I mention Lester Bowie (of the Art Ensemble of Chicago), and his outstanding work on vocalizing trumpet sounds with his own voice? Or Captain Beefheart's stretching and splitting his voice into octaves on "When Big Joan Sets Up" on the Trout Mask Replica LP? Check them out.

Of course, I should add that Tibetan monks, through the use of certain air and breathing techniques, have succeeded in producing three and more tones with their voices. Sure beats gargling...

Lost Celebrity Series: This Week, Stove Fold

In Concert:
Jackson Browne
Linda Ronstadt
Orpheum — Boston
March 1

Despite Chesty Morgan's (73-24-36) appearing a few blocks down Washington Street from the Orpheum, it became apparent after the opening notes of Linda Ronstadt's first number, "Colorado", that the real thrills were indeed to be had right here. It was a double bill that couldn't miss. When Linda announced "You're No Good" would be her last song so she could make way for Jackson, half the audience cheered in anticipation while the other half vociferously expressed their disapproval of Linda's leaving. It was that kind of evening.

Linda and Jackson have been touring together for a few months now. Jackson prefers (read "demands") an opening act that is female in gender and acoustic in genre. Last year's partner was Bonnie Raitt, while this year Linda is whetting audiences' at the same time, almost stealing the show away from Jackson.

Her Boston performance consisted largely of songs from Don't Cry Now, doubtlessly her finest album yet. Besides "Colorado", a Flying Burrito Brothers' ballad where Linda's voice soars like a majestic bird, she did J. D. Souther's "A Fast One", the Eagles' "Desperado", a definite crowd pleaser, and "Love Has No Pride", where Linda effortlessly glides over the chorus' shimmering high notes.

The high point of Linda's performance, and probably the entire night, was when she reached for her acoustic guitar and proceeded to stultify the audience with a magnificent version of "Long, Long Time." One could hear a pin drop as the almost-filled house gawked in silent ecstasy.

Jackson Browne made his way to the stage and broke into "Take It Easy", made into a hit single by the Eagles, and resurrected on Jackson's latest record, For Everyman. After explaining Lowell George of Little Feat was amongst our presence, he introduced "Lady of the Well" as "a song about a wanderer in Mexico." Next was the heart-rendering "Song for Adam", from his first lp. He explained "For Everyman" as "a song for people I used to have as friends."

Stepping to the piano, he played "Jamaica Say You will" ("written for a girl who used to live across the street from the Pacific Ocean") and "Ready Or Not" ("written for my old lady thirteen months ago. It happened at the Troubador Bar in Hollywood.")

During his performance, Jackson made his way from acoustic guitar, to piano and finally to electric guitar, where he finished off his set with rip-snorting versions of "Rock Me On The Water" and "Doctor My Eyes". As an encore, he kept the plugs in their sockets for a rousing "Redneck Friend" and "Sweet Little Sixteen", then after a screaming Boston audience got him back once again, he re-introduced Linda and the two did a short, but satisfying tune, "One More Song."

In Concert:
Yes
Boston Garden
Feb. 26

It is truly rare to see an audience known for their madness react to any group of musicians with respect. Such was the case last Tuesday night at Boston Garden. It is also rare to see the masses alert enough to actually listen rather than collecting in the empty aisles mumbling deliriously, foaming at the mouth.

Sometimes around 9:30, after the spinning disc, after the sound of waves had died out, Yes waltzed across the garden's crowded stage, apologizing for the delay. After they climbed over their props and around their numerous instruments, you braced yourself. To want to hear Yes at the Garden is definitely displaying your masochistic tendencies but you look around and notice the packed Garden and you realize you're not alone. You take a firm grasp of the stranger next to you; it couldn't be all that bad. Surprisingly enough, it was far more than decent. You loosen up your hold on this stranger, apologize to him and begin to listen.

They did all four sides of Tales From Topographic Oceans, as well as "Close To The Edge" with double the intensity of the all perfectly synchoronized: the rule rather than the exception with Yes.

It ended late, around midnight, with "Roundabout", the only time the audience seemed to awaken from their amazed stupor since the toilet-paper, frisbee throwing tournament earlier in the evening. With their hearing devices still slightly numb, they wandered out already missing or just catching the last trains home.

Incomparable and only excellent: Yes in Boston.

New In Town:
The Littlest Coffeeshop
Amherst

What happens when you place 35 people in a tiny, trolley-turned-restaurant, put good ragtime musicians up on a platform in front of them, and have a waitress in a purple velvet gown dashing around serving pastries? CHAOS? Not Always.

The Littlest Coffeehouse, located in the Equinox Cafe, in Amherst center, celebrated its opening Friday night with bursting seams, but mellow vibes. People sat on laps, squeezed into booths with strangers, but contributed to making the atmosphere comfortable by singing with the performers, laughing a great deal, and getting to know the people snuggled next to them.

The performers were James Johnston and Michael McDonnell, two students from Hampshire College, and Dan and Jude Itkin, with their friend Bill, playing banjo and guitar numbers.

The Littlest Coffeehouse was opened to provide a place for the talented accoustic musicians of Amherst to perform. It is open on Friday nights, from 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. All money collected from sale of coffee and pastries goes to the musicians.

This Friday's (March 8) performers are Ruth and Jon, lady guitarist-singer and her flute accompanist. Mark Shapiro, a folk guitarist and composer follows. You should stop in and enjoy the music and warm atmosphere.

Books 'Surgeon' of The Human Experience

The Case Worker
by George Konrad
Published by Harcourt, Brace, Jovanovitch, Inc.
173 pages - $6.95

reviewed by Kevin Mack

One of the more effective methods which law enforcement agencies have for obtaining information about an individual is to sift through that person's garbage. They have discovered that what an individual throws away tells a lot. In The Case Worker, a most auspicious first novel, a young Hungarian writer, George Konrad, examines human refuse; the disfunctional projects of modern society.

The novel, which is short and experimental in style, has for its main character a nameless first person singular; a social worker in modern Budapest. His cases number among the perennial losers; the societal cloaca. Suicidal and perverted, his cases are the extreme products of society; the outer tributaries of society's mainstream; the borderline cases which more lucidly than the norm, define the nature of the whole.

Mr. Konrad's Case Worker speaks of his society with a depth and universality which extends his vision to include all of us — the "we", which is the first person plural. His namelessness and facelessness is not conditioned by an insecurity of identity; it is the effect of his fundamental virtuousness. The Case Worker is a good man in a sinister society. His apparent lack of identity is merely the pose which society compels him to assume.

George Konrad, himself a social worker in Budapest, has published numerous papers on sociology and literature before publishing The Case Worker in 1969. Since then it has been translated into several languages. It has only recently been released in English.

What little plot there is in the novel concerns the Case worker and his involvement with an idiot child. The Case Worker's specific job is being a "Baby snatcher". "To protect children and safeguard the interests of the state", is how he describes his position. His clients are the displaced and homeless children and their parents. He is a social scientist and these clients are his empirical data. Mr. Konrad writes of his main character, "His cases, which arise when the traffic of human relationships gets jammed for shorter or longer periods, predictably repeat themselves with a certain statistical regularity."

Mr. Konrad's novel begins with pungent descriptions of the Case Worker's clients and his work, which he compares to that of a "surgeon who sews up his incision without removing the tumor." The anguished desperate cries of his clients are routine occurrences. And he has learned to listen with the ear of a scientist, not caring that his clients frequently mistake this attitude for more genuine concern.

The Case Worker's own personal history is only sparsely related: he is the product of a middle class upbringing; he was in the army; and he studied law at college. There is an encounter with a Buddhist reporter, who tells him that, "Our whole existence is sullied with violence. A man who participates in such mass slaughter, made possible by modern technology, will turn against his brothers tomorrow and crush them with his machines, methodically and quickly, recognizing no other sin than wasted motion." The Case Worker sees the truth of the Buddhist's words, but cannot bring himself to follow his "weightless, vegetarian morality". "In a few naive propositions, (the Buddhist), swept away the very names of existing nations, institutions, churches, and armies . . . If I had subscribed to his breviary of universal meekness and succeeded in forgetting what I knew of suicides, mental institutions, prisons, and other dismal facts of life, what would I have been offered in exchange?"

Somehow, in the course of his daily grind, the Case Worker becomes inextricably involved with an idiot child. Ferike Bandula's parents, his father, a schizophrenic ex-political scientist, and his mother, a fanatically religious former beauty, have just poisoned themselves. Ferike is their five year old child. He is completely incapable of learning or of communication, only of grunting and biting. Rather than attempt to toilet train the child, The Bandulas left him naked in his crib, throwing him food when they had any, and letting him deficate at will. The child's very existence tempts the definition of the word "human".

"We can learn from idiots", the Case Worker tells us. From this idiot child he learns that no human life has any more value than any other human life. He sees that his cases are victims; but they are not blameless. They are no better or worse than any other human beings.

For a brief moment the Case Worker engages in eschatalogical speculation. He ponders spending the rest of his days with this idiot child; trying to reach it; sitting in old Bandula's rocking chair, swaying back and forth and alternatively gazing into the idiot's eyes and observing the grimy city street outside his window; the Case Worker realizes that their is no significant difference between their respective views.

But the Case Worker does not abandon his job and go to live with the cild. This is not a cop out; it is merely an acceptance of human weakness. — Weakness which arises from the fear of the cohesive violence which is the essence of society: he is justly terrified of the padded cells and locked doors which await those who rebel completely. This fear is firmly grounded in the empirical data which he has accumulated in his profession. And he knows he is too weak — too human to conquer this necessary veil of paranoia.

The Case Worker ends, appropriately, with a sort of list. The list is one of the commonest forms of bureaucratic communication and the Case Worker is, after all, a bureaucrat. This list, which goes on for three pages is an invitation from the Case Worker to his clients, "The children — our examiners . . . the babies abandoned in doctor's offices and on stranger's laps, on park benches and in garbage cans . . Let the tyrants of selfishness come . . . the eternal underdogs . . . the Bungling mechanics . . . Let all those come who want to; one of us will talk, the other will listen: at least we shall be together."

I suppose that the ability to justify one's existence is the most efficacious test of the security of one's identity.

The nameless, faceless Case Worker more than adequately justifies himself with the sincerity and lack of condescension of his final invitation, which is really to all of us. And we should be content to find ourselves on the Case Worker's definitive list.

KGB: Right Wing Nightmare

by John Barron
$10.95, 462 pp. Reader's Digest Press

Reviewed by Ed Smith

The KGB, (Komitet Gosudarstvennoy Bezopasnati) is the chief arm of the Soviet Secret Service. It has been in force since shortly after the Bolshevik revolution. The organization's purpose is twofold. On the one hand it is responsible for the internal security of the Soviet Union. In addition, it serves as the principle foreign intelligence agency of the country.

John Barron's book, KGB, is an interesting attempt at a brief history of the activities of this organization. As a senior editor of "Reader's Digest", Barron's writing reflects to some extent the extreme rightist views of that magazine. However, it is not nearly as virulent an attack on communism as is characteristic of "Reader's Digest". Barron makes allowances for some element of humanity in his treatment of the Russians. In the introduction, Robert Conquest says, "This book . . . implies the need for continual vigilance." Barron is able to imply this without actually denouncing the Russians in rightist cliches.

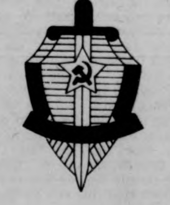
A great deal of the book is taken up by case histories. In general the histories examine operations which were stopped before any significant damage was done. The characters on both sides are stereotypes because it is the events which are emphasized, not the personalities. Consequently, the Russians are usually shown as compassionless, subhuman plotters and the Americans as benevolent, ready to forgive, protectors of democracy. I wonder if the Rosenbergs saw it that way.

These little scenes though, are the most interesting, part of the book. They have been constructed from the accounts of former agents and defectors. It is not difficult to imagine that such people would tend to put their former comrades in a rather poor light in an effort to get in good with their new friends. Nevertheless, much of the book reads like a spy-thriller and for that reason alone it could be considered worth reading. In one example, the author draws out a scenario linking the KGB with President Kennedy's assasination and blithely declares Lee Harvey Oswald as the assassin.

Barron claims his information is derived from former agents, the FBI and the CIA. As well, he has obtained, from where is not clear, a training manual for KGB agents. It outlines techniques to be used in recruiting Americans as agents. Barron reproduces a large portion of the pamphlet in one of the appendices of the book. It is amusing to read because it contains many of the same euphemisms Americans have come to regard as political rhetoric.

In addition to the KGB, Barron describes some of the activities of the GRU (Glavnoye Razriedyvatelnoye Upravliiye), a secret service of the military. Until it became a virtual subsidiary of the KGB, the GRU conducted a large amount of foreign espionage. According to Barron, the KGB has now monopolized all secret police operations on both a national and international level.

The KGB is a fearful manifestation of the modern age. The ability to hold a rein on an entire country is what makes the organization so fearful. Their international operations are not really that different from the operations of half a dozen similar agencies in western countries. However, evidence of an organized system to hold an entire country effectively paralyzed is something which does call for "continual vigilance". This vigilance though, should not be directed so much against sinister, if somewhat mythologized, foreign agents: Rather, it should warn us how easily such a system can develop. In this country we have already had alarming evidence of such developments. Infiltration of groups opposing the government, uncovered conspiracies against individual citizens and the like are chilling parallels to KGB activities in the Soviet Union.



Sword and Shield:
The KGB Trademark

In this country a willingness to allow such things to go on can be witnessed. "Law and Order" and "National Security" have been used all too often as excuses for abridgements of civil rights. I agree with Barron that there is a lesson to be learned from the KGB, but our opinions differ on what that lesson should be.

Endgame: Interestingly Boring

by Tom Glynn

"The farther he goes, the more good it does me. He is the most courageous, remorseless writer going and the more he grinds my nose in the shit the more I am grateful to him." — Harold Pinter commenting on Samuel Beckett.

It is hard to explain a play by Samuel Beckett because his plays are more sensual than intellectual. As a playwright, he has no philosophical questions or answers, no statement to make. He presents a true situation and forces the audience member to experience it. It doesn't matter if the "true situation" is not a situation that we commonly run up against, what matters is that we believe it to be true for the characters in that situation. As Peter Brook says in The Empty Space; "In everyday life, 'if' is a fiction, in the theatre, 'if' is an experiment, 'if' is the truth. When we are persuaded to believe in this truth, then the theatre and life are one."

The central character in Endgame is Hamm, who is paralyzed from the waist down and blind. He has a servant, Clov, whose "specialty" is that he can not sit. Also under Hamm's power are his parents, Nagg and Nell both of whom are legless and reside in a laundry cart and a cardboard carton respectively. The play opens, or rather, the situation begins, prior to the audience' arrival with Clov going through the ritual of looking out the windows, in this case the windows above the balcony on the left and right side of the auditorium. This arduous task completed (with the help of a thirty foot ladder) and the audience seated, he proceeds to remove the sheets that have been covering Nagg, Nell and Hamm. He wakes Hamm up, who sleeps with a handkerchief over his head.

Hamm begins to continue telling himself a story "the one you have been telling yourself all your days". He bullies Clov; making him push the deskchair in which he is confined all around, open and shut his parent's containers, carry and fetch, and look through the windows. Clov is trying to leave. Nagg nags Hamm for a biscuit and loves Nell, for whom he tells a joke. Nell dies. Clov kills a rat in his kitchen (off stage) and a flea on his person. Looking through the window for "the last time" Clov sees what looks like a small boy. He then retires to change into his traveling clothes and reappears as Hamm discards all of his possessions: his whistle, with which he summoned Clov, his gaff, with which he propelled his chair, and his toy dog. Clov does not leave. Hamm replaces handkerchief on face. Endgame.

The Manhattan Project Company's production of this play, under the direction of Andre Gregory was unique. Incorporating vaudeville music, sight gags and double entendres they managed to exploit every possibility for humor that existed in the situation. This I assume, was their experiment. For example, when Hamm asks Clov how he is feeling, Clov replies "I don't complain" to which Hamm retorts "I feel a little queer" and makes a grab for Clov's vitals. I feel reasonably sure that Beckett didn't mean that as a homosexual reference, but it was funny. And criticism of this production centered on the fact that the company was not faithful to the script would, I think be unjustified because the script only gives you the dialogue and some stage direction. What is done with the dialogue and stage direction is up to the performers.

And since this play has no "meaning" or "message" there is a broad freedom involved in its production. The only thing that really matters in a play like this is its effect on an audience.

While this particular experiment was not a complete failure, it was not really as successful as it might have been. For example, I thought a fire was beginning on stage until I realized that the smoke coming out of the laundry cart was merely Nagg having a cigarette. Hamm continually used his face as though he were not blind and even went so far as to zero in on his hat which had fallen to the floor. The singing of "Please Release Me" seemed more editorial than organic. Finally, and most importantly, the audience was bored to the point of alienation. It is important that the audience should experience the tediousness and boredom of the situation in Endgame; one should feel a sense of dread at the prospect of Clov climbing that thirty foot ladder again to look out the window and a sense of relief when he decides not to and says he did. One should be in some agreement with Hamm when, toward the end he says, "Ah let's get it over." The danger lies in the audience becoming so bored that they lose interest and have lost all concentration on the play. In other words, the performance must be interestingly boring.

Two and a half hours without intermission is a long time to hold an audience's attention but maybe two hours is too short a time to convey a sense of tediousness relative to this situation. Boredom and tediousness belong to life but an alienated audience can only exist in either a theatre or a church.

Otherwise, Endgame was very interesting and worth seeing. The acting was excellent, especially on the part of Clov (the program notes did not list actors by character). His voice and body movements were well coordinated and his concentration was maintained flawlessly throughout.

Whether a person left the theatre elated or depressed did not matter and in that sense this was a very successful production.

Papillon

by Stuart Sojcher

In this period of low budget films it is surprising to see thirteen and a half million dollars spent on a movie. However, in putting together two big name actors, Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman, an experienced director of the big budget spectacular, Franklin J. Schaffner, and a good story, a movie studio figures that the initial investment will pay off handsomely. In the case of Papillon it has.

Briefly, Papillon is the true story of Henri Charriere who was sentenced to the French penal colony of Guiana for a murder he claimed not to have committed. From the moment he sets foot on the ship which will take him to Guiana his mind is obsessed with one thing-escape. But escape is not that easy and the consequences for being caught are harsh: first, one year's solitary confinement on half rations and a 6 month period in total darkness; then, following five years in solitary, a sentence to Devil's Island. Throughout these years of torture, hunger and frustration Charriere's will never wavers and finally his efforts prove fruitful as he escapes permanently, the only man to do so from Devil's Island.

Steve McQueen plays Charriere and can one think of anyone else who better fits the part? McQueen has always been a 'non-actor' relying on his cool manner and facial expressions to carry off his usual role of the cool, rugged individual. In Papillon McQueen has somewhat of the same role, however, the character demands a lot more than looking good and he delivers a superb performance. It's surprising to note that McQueen wasn't nominated for an Academy Award and the same goes for his co-star Hoffman, who plays an intellectual counterfeitor.

Though the film is blessed with fine acting and a lush musical score, nominated for an Academy Award it is the photography which is most outstanding. Some of the best scenes in the film are the shots of McQueen, Hoffman and another prisoner traveling towards freedom in a small boat in the middle of the ocean. The ocean is a clear dark blue contrasted by a light blue sky: the screen vibrates with color. Later there is some other fine camera work of McQueen's brief stay among a tribe of natives, especially the scenes of him swimming with a native girl and a gorgeous shot of him looking out over the ocean wondering if he will ever return to France. The photography lends a dreamlike effect to the film at times and one almost wishes that one were along on the journey, but only some of the time.

The film is about two and a half hours long and it is a bit slow at times. Many have commented that after viewing the film they felt that they had also been subjected to McQueen's excruciating trials. And he does literally go through hell, physical and psychological. Imagine eating insects for food, living in total darkness and not speaking to anyone for five years. The film is also quite graphic in showing blood. In the beginning of the movie McQueen slits someones throat; a prisoner cuts open his knee in hopes of being kept out of hard labor; and a young boy is shot through the head while trying to escape as the camera shows the blood oozing out of his head. The film simply drains you.

Yet Papillon is more than just a depiction of forms of terror. It is more than the incredible story of one man's fight for freedom. It is a story of man's insurmountable will. In a time where heroes are few, Henri Charriere is a person with whom one can identify, a man whose will and belief in freedom are stronger than any pain, any hunger, any torture. All of us have those qualities but most of the time they don't surface.

The French word "Papillon" means "butterfly" in English. On Henri Charriere's chest was tatooed a butterfly. That seems rather apropos as a butterfly represents freedom. Charriere obtained that freedom by his unrelenting will and beliefs. In a way all of us are that butterfly. But the only way we are able to fly is to believe that we really can.

A WEEK OF FILM

Compiled by Eileen McKnight

ALEX IN WONDERLAND (1970) ++
A 36 yr. old director, Donald Sutherland, after having made an immensely successful first film, sinks into controlled despair as he tries to find a new project. His family drives him crazy and offers no sympathy till he finally has himself believing Fellini is his spiritual kin. There are Fellini images which appear in the film, (clowns, dwarfs) which are meant to as comic hommage to the film maker but don't come off as such. The scenes of Sutherland and Ellen Burstyn as his wife along with their two kids are funny but not much else. Playing at Main Lec. Hall Franklin Patterson, Hampshire Thur., March 14.

AMERICAN GRAFFITI +++
This film is more than just another nostalgic look into the fifties. It grapples with the very real difficulties of growing up and finding a niche for oneself in the adult world. The film recounts the exploits of four friends on the night before they are to go their separate ways; some to college, others to continue to haunt the local street corners. There's a lot of fun and good music, but also some interesting studies of American youth. Playing at the Mountain Farms Mall.

BEDLAM (1942) ++
A horror with the master Boris himself. This is one of his lesser known movies but is interesting. Karloff plays a sadistic asylum director who is bricked up alive by the inmates. Playing Tues., March 12, 7:30 p.m. in Lec Room 3 Merrill, Amherst.

COMEDY FILM FESTIVAL
Starring Charlie Chaplin, W.C. Fields, Laural and Hardy Buster Keaton. this will be a ten hour, all-night barrel of laughs. Saturday night, March 9 at Hampden S.U. 8 p.m. to 6 a.m.

CRIES AND WHISPERS (1973) ++++
Ingmar Bergman displays his cinematic genius in this film. His use of color, sound and silence is fantastic. As usual, the film deals with the human relationship or lack thereof. The plot revolves around three sisters, their husbands, their servants, and their fantasies. If you have a hard time separating 'real' life from fantasy, remember that color is the key. A truely fascinating film. Playing at the Academy of Music, Mountain Farms Mall and on Sun. it will be in the S.U.B. at 7 and 9.

GENTLEMAN'S AGREEMENT (1948) ++
A product of post war formula directed by Elia Kazan. Gregory Peck stars as a journalist who poses as a Jew to investigate anti-Semitism in the U.S. after the war. His impersonation causes problems in his family life with his wife, Dorothy McGuire. It's not one of the most thrilling movies on this subject but was significant as an anti-racist film at the time. John Garfield gives an excellent performance in a supporting role. Playing Tues., March 12 at 8 p.m. Lec. Room 1 Merrill, Amherst.

THE GREAT ESCAPE (1963) ++++
If you've already missed this once here's your chance to see one of the greatest adventure films ever made. John Sturges directed this film about a group of prisoners in a German camp who plan a great escape. Steve McQueen plays the 'Cooler King' and James Gardner his counterpart who scrounges supplies. They do pull off the escape but gradually get caught only after causing the German's much embarrassment. Playing Sat., March 9 Main Lec. Hall Franklin Patterson Hall, Hampshire at 7:30.

I ACCUSE (1958) +
This screenplay by Gore Vidal and Directed by Jose Ferrer, who also stars, dramatizes details of the Dreyfus Affair that took place in France 60 years ago. Dreyfus is portrayed as an unfortunate victim of bureaucratic bungling instead of the common image of the Jewish scapegoat. Wednesday, March 13 in the S.U.B. at 7 and 9.

KING OF HEARTS (1967) ++++
Philippe De Broca's satirical look at war and society that can't help but win over each viewer. A town in France is taken over by inmates of an insane asylum when it is vacated, due to the fact that it is going to be blown up. Alan Bates comes from a Scottish Regiment to help find the bomb and recomes the "King of Hearts" and succeeds in saving the community. The German's return and battle with the Scottish after which the inmates decide that life in the asylum is more sane than the outside world. Mr. Bates joins them in what has become the classic manner. A penetrating comedy encased in a beautiful movie. Playing Friday, March 8 in Mahar Aud. 7, 9 and 11.

KUHLE WAMPE (1932) ++
Directed by Bertolt Brecht about the life of unemployed workers in Germany who organize a community. It deals with the political fights that preceeded Hitler's rule and was banned by the Nazi's in '33. It profoundly depicts the working class and their hopelessness. Main Lec. Hall Franklin Patterson Hall, Hampshire at 7:30 Monday, March 11.

LADY SINGS THE BLUES (1972) ++++
Dianna Ross portrays a great lady, Billie Holiday, whose life swung from success to tragedy. A great movie with a great soundtrack, playing on campus Friday in the S.U.B. at 6:30, 9 and 11:30 and then again on Saturday in Mahar Aud. at the same times.

THE LEARNING TREE (1969) ++
Written, and directed by Gordon Parks about life in a Kansas town 40 years ago. It is the story of a boy's youth and his experiences growing up dealing with sex, love, death, and the injustice brought against him cause of his color. The emotion of the film becomes drained after awhile but is good visually. Gamble Aud. Mt. Holyoke, Sat., March 9, 7:30.

LIMELIGHT (1952) +++
Chaplin's last American Film is more touching and tender than any of his others. Chaplin succeeds in combining inner pathos with comedy. In this particular film we are treated to a duet performance of Chaplin and Buster Keaton. The theme song "Eternally" is known as one of the best songs made in the 50's. Chaplin plays an alcoholic who helps a dancer overcome her depression. He prevents her from committing suicide and aids in her attainment of stardom. Playing in Thompson 104 Monday, March 11 at 8, 10:30.

LOVE ME TONIGHT (1932) ++
Another Hollywood musical of the 30's but with the Parisian Don Juan, Maurice Chevalier. This is one of the last to come out of that decade before film became more sophisticated. Chevalier and Jeanette MacDonald dance, sing, and romance to the direction of Robert Mamoulin who carries the wit of Lubitsch. The score is by Rogers and Hart. (Everyone remembers 'Mimi' and 'Isn't It Romantic'). If not come see what you've been missing on Tues., March 12 CC101 at 8 and 10. The film will be doubling with Mr. Smith Goes to Washington.

MODERN TIMES (1936)
Chaplin's voice was first heard in this series of hilarious gags which comprise a sociological comedy about how to be happy though poor in the machine age. One of his most consistently funny films. As usual, produced, directed and starring him, with Paulette Goddard as the waif. Amherst Cinema

NEW YORK FESTIVAL OF WOMEN'S FILMS +++
Wednesday, March 13 in the CCA at 7 and 9:30.

PAPER CHASE +++
A drama exploring the rigors of a Harvard Law school student. Some excellent performances, especially John Houseman as a professor of contractual law. An interesting film, but the melodramatic finish leaves one wondering if the script writer didn't just run out of gas. Mountain Farms Mall.

PAPILLON +++
Steve McQueen and Dustin Hoffman star in this epic adventure film, based on the memoirs of the late Henri Charriere, who at the age of 25 was sentenced to a life of hard labor in the French penal colony of Guiana. Unlike most protagonists in this age of the anti-hero, McQueen displays the virtues which enable him to overcome what appear to be insurmountable hardships and achieve freedom. Sometimes the flashbacks to Charriere's younger days in Paris appear obtuse; still the superb acting of McQueen and the sheer fascination with his struggle for freedom, save the film from mediocrity. Playing at the Calvin and Campus Cinema.

PLAY IT AGAIN SAM (1972) +++
Woody Allen wrote, directed and starred in this film which is a typical Allen film. If you like him, go, because the film is hysterical, if not, don't. Allen plays the klutz, as usual, who goes to pieces everytime he's near a girl; thus he gets the most debonnaire person for advice, Humphrey Bogart. Except Bogart is only in Woody's imagination, which brings some very amusing results. Playing in the CCA Friday, March 8 at 7, 9 and 11.

SLEEPER ++++
Allen is the writer, director and star of this new film which finds him awakening in 2173 after being frozen for 200 years after an operation for an ulcer went amiss. This futuristic satire is full of the usual Allen one liners and sight gags, but with some Chaplinesque slapstick added. Showcase Cinemas, West Springfield and Campus Cinemas.

THE STING ++++
Newman and Redford excell as a pair of con men operating in Chicago about the time of the depression. But the film is more than just these two charming heros. The elaborately planned con of an underworld kingpin keeps the audience guessing from the start to finish, with the finale leaving one thoroughly astounded. It's an authentic look into the Thirties with a number of Joplin rags thrown in. For sheer entertainment it can't be beat. Mt. Farms and Showcase.

SUMMER OF '42 (1972) ++
The film that started everyone on the nostalgia kick. It's the story of three boys working their way through growing pains. The jokes are a bit common by now but the innocence of the boys lifts the film from mediocracy. Worth seeing if you haven't already. Playing Fri., Sat., and Sun. at Merrill, Amherst, Lec. Room 1 7:30 and 9:30.

TAKE THE MONEY AND RUN (1969) +++
Woody Allen's debut as director although he wrote the screenplay also. A very funny movie about a schlemeil, Virgil Starkwell who cannot do anything right. When he tries to rob a gumball machine his hand gets stuck in the slot, this is Virgil's fate in any attempt throughout life. The film is a comedy of short takes and the pacing carries the view over the bad gags right into the new ones. Tues., March 12 S.U.B. at 7, 9 and 11.

TOP HAT (1935) +++
Ginger Roger's and Fred Astaire are at their peak in this amusing comedy musical with a score by Irving Berlin. There isn't much plot but it's an entertaining film in the good ol' 30's tradition. Everyone will remember the tunes such as 'Cheek to Cheek' and both stars prove themselves as top dancers. Gamble Aud. Mt. Holyoke on Tues., March 12.

WHO'S AFRAID OF VIRGINIA WOLFE? (1966) ++++
Nichols debut as director was a sure shot to success after filming this quick paced tight film about George and Martha. George, (Richard Burton) is a professor at a New England college and his wife's father is the president. Liz Taylor gives a remarkable performance as the vulgar wife hiding her femine insecurity who believes she has a son. When she goes to bed with a younger colleague of George's. George pulls the breathe out of her dream. They are a couple who have destroyed each other and themselves during their 20 years of marriage. But we can see something touching and sad between them. George Segal plays the younger man and Sandy Dennis, his wife. Excellent, excellent movie. Playing at the Globe in Northampton.

ZACHARIAH (1972) ++
Described as the 'first electric western' and that it is. John Rubinstein plays a young man who becomes a sharpshooter, kills an infamous black bandit (Elvin Jones) yet decides he doesn't want to become the number one man and travels to the city where he meets up with buxomy Belle Starr. Decides this isn't the life for him either and retires to a hermit's abode where he learns to enjoy nature and the uselessness of violence. His friend (Don Johnson) comes looking for him yet he reforms also and they ride off into the sunset. The script was written by Firesign Theatre but Zachariah does not use their verbal wit to capacity. The funniest misadventures occur when the boys meet up with an outlaw band, the Crakers, played by Country Joe and the Fish, who 'sure play better than they rob.' On the whole a fun movie. Playing in Mahar on Wednesday at 7 and 9.

UMass may establish law school

By MARY MUIRHEAD
MDC Staff

The expansion of UMass during the last ten years has been impressive (doubling its doctoral and masters programs and adding over 35 new undergraduate majors), but one area left undeveloped is the creation of a law school.

According to the Quinn Committee (1972) which researched this problem, "Massachusetts is the only state with a major industrial population that has not created a public law school." Among the 50 largest universities in the country, Massachusetts is the only public institution without a law school.

Although the state does have 5 accredited private law schools (all in the Boston area), less than half of their students are Massachusetts' residents.

In 1971 UMass president Robert Wood appointed a committee to research the establishment of a public law school in Massachusetts. With Attorney General Robert Quinn as its chairman, the committee concerned itself with the lack of openings in law schools compared with student demand, the difficulties in providing legal education for the poor and minorities (women included), the need for new approaches to the study of law and the services such a public program could offer the community.

Inflation has prevented existing schools from expanding their facilities to handle the growing numbers of applicants. High tuition rates prevent low and middle income students from receiving adequate financial aid. The committee estimated that 300-500 students who are accepted into Massachusetts' law schools never go because of insufficient financial aid. These are two problems a public law school would help to alleviate.

The report, finished in May 1972, proposed the establishment of a "Law Center" at UMass which would not only train lawyers but would offer legal education to undergraduates and help to give those outside the profession a better understanding of our legal systems.

The undergraduate program would encompass both law as liberal arts and law in a more career-oriented sense. The present undergraduate Legal Studies department, co-ordinated by Claude L. Shepard, is part of that dream. It is designed to explore the nature of law, not to feed its students into law school.

The responsibility of a public law center to the community would be essential, considering that it would be directly funded through the public. The program could help the community in any number of ways:

—1 Students and faculty assisting local governments with special projects.

—2 Continuing education for practicing lawyers and law enforcement officials to increase their knowledge of changes in the law.

—3 Education of the public through the distribution of helpful information.

A law center in Amherst would not only benefit UMass but also Western Massachusetts which is not serviced by any accredited law school.

In an interview with the Collegian, Dr. Robert Woodbury (Associate Provost), Dean Alfange of social and behavioral sciences, and Professor Peter d'Errico (Legal Studies) outlined some of the opposition toward the law center.

The Massachusetts Bar Association is against it because not only does Massachusetts have a high ratio of lawyers per capita, but the no-fault auto insurance has diminished a number of legal positions.

What they fail to consider is that Eastern Massachusetts has by far a greater number of lawyers than the western part of the state. The 1970 State Ratio of Lawyers per Capita was 1:451. Suffolk County, however, had a ratio of 1:37 compared with the 1:1514 ratio of Franklin and Hampshire counties.

The established private law schools also oppose the plan and claim they would admit more Massachusetts residents to their schools if they received proper funding.

Massachusetts State Law Article XVIII, however, prohibits "the use of public money or property or loan of public credit...to any college which is not publicly owned and under the exclusive control...of public officers..."

Probably the most significant opposer is the Governor, who has the power to recommend or to deny recommendation of the proposal to the state legislature. The governor feels that such a project would be too expensive for Massachusetts' stringent budget to handle.

Until the governor decides on the issue (it's been almost 2 years) the idea of a law center for UMass will go nowhere.

Asst. Prof. Laszlo Tikos

UMass' Tikos tells of Russian writer's trial

By BONNIE ASSELIN
MDC Staff

The plight of the Russian writer demanding literary freedom before the powerful threat of Soviet authority is a story never losing its timeliness. The war between the Soviet leaders and the Russian intellectuals has been a struggle ever since the beginning of the totalitarian government. Today, Aleksandr I. Solzhenitsyn's exile has gained the world's attention and sympathy; yesterday, it was the trial of Andrei D. Sinyavsky, Russian literary critic and creative writer.

The send-off for Solzhentisyn was the publication of his dissident book, The Gulag Archipelago, abroad (in defiance of Russian Criminal Code which condemns foreign publication). Similarly, on February 14, 1966, Sinyavsky was convicted of slandering the State in writings published in the West and sentenced to seven years imprisonment in the vast network of Soviet slave-labor camps. He was released six years later, 1972, and in August, 1973, he and his family were allowed to "emigrate." They now reside in Paris, France, where Sinyavsky, 48, teaches Russian Literature at the Sorbonne.

Laszlo M. Tikos, associate professor of Slavic languages and Literatures at UMass, is one of the few American citizens granted a meeting with the Russian critic and writer, Sinyavsky. Dr. Tikos wrote him a letter requesting permission to visit, and last December, Sinyavsky consented to the meeting. With the aid of a University grant, in January he spent three weeks in Paris. Three of those nights were valuably spent with the heroic Russian writer, when the eight-year ordeal was enfolded to Tikos.

Sinyavsky and solzhenitsyn have been of special interest to him. Sinyavsky's book, For Freedom of Imagination, was translated and introduced by Tikos and his colleague, Murray Peppard. He has written, Solzhenitsyn: A Critical Appraisal, soon to be published. He also plans to write an essay for the New York Times on Sinyavsky, focusing on the author's literary works, as a result of the January interview.

Dr. Tikos has also written to Solzhenitsyn's lawyer, similarly requesting a conference with the writer. He has yet to receive a reply.

Dr. Tikos revealed the story of Sinyavsky's trial to the Collegian. Another writer was also convicted, Yuli M. Daniel, a lesser-known poet and translator. The two published fictional stories under pseudonyms: Abram Tertz (Sinyavsky) and Nikolai Arzhak (Daniel). The Soviet prosecutors accused them of malisciously intending to spread anti-Soviet propaganda and agitation. The two, teachers at Moscow's Gorky Institute of World's Literature, publicly declared their innocence. Protest mounted, but nevertheless, they were sentenced.

Dr. Tikos reflected on the irony of the individual sentences: Sinyavsky received seven years and Daniel, only five. Daniel's writings were more political, he said. "Paradoxically, Sinyavsky deals in religion; he's not interested in politics."

He compared the Russian government to the American government. "The supposedly 'secret' system of slave-labor camps is like Watergate," he said. The corruption in both governments is slowly being revealed, he observed.

Prison camp officials constantly tried to bribe Sinyavsky into compliane. They offered him soft jobs and special treatment, but he said, "No, treat me like the others."

"What to do with them, prisoners whose spirit remains unbroken?" was once again the question the Soviet government faced after his release in 72. "He basically had three alternatives: to accept an offered 'soft' job, to live on his wife's wages and remain unemployed, or to work on getting permission to leave Russia," Tikos explained. He chose the third.

Dr. Tikos called it the "two-prong approach." He scheduled his book, A Voice from the Choir, based on prisoner's conversation during his imprisonment, for publication. At the same time he applied for emmigration to Israel, claiming to have Jewish relatives there. The Jewish relative claim was made over and over again for permission to emigrate. Sinyavsky knew it. The Soviets knew it. Yet, consent was given in August, 1973.

Sinyavsky is writing two other books on his imprisonment. "No, he's not drained by the exile", Tikos explained. "He has enough material for a lifetime," unlike Solzhenitsyn who calls exile "spiritual castrations."

Bromery to go before House

By JUDY FRIEDLAND
MDC Staff

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery will go before the Massachusetts House Ways and Means Committee today to ask for an increase in Governor Sargent's recommended $66,500,000 budget for the UMass-Amherst campus for fiscal year '75. This figure is $2,073,720 less than the University's proposal of $68,573.720.

Budget Director Warren Gulko said that the University's proposal represented an 8.7 per cent increase over fiscal year '74. Higher prices account for two-thirds of the raise.

"This is a very conservative estimate," said Gulko, "considering the higher prices we now pay for postage and paper, among other items."

The figure excludes the cost of utilities, for which the University has requested a separate state subsidy.

According to Gulko, the Governor's budget does not provide for extension or expansion.

Gulko explained that the state funds 60 per cent of the budget, and the Federal government and student fees each contribute 20 per cent of the money. Students pay fees for use of the "auxiliary enterprises", such as residence halls, food services, and the Campus Center.

Gulko said that the University tries to avoid "significant" fee increases.

"There have to be some increases, though," he said, "in order to pay for increased services and utilities."

"We fought hard," said Rick Savini, chairperson of the Student Senate Rents and Fees Committee, which reviews the student fees part of the budget, "but the Administration finally agreed on a 'zero budget'. They withdrew their original proposal of a $55 per student increase in residence hall fees. Students will probably have to pay about $20 more, however, for food services, as well as $8 extra for the Campus Center," he said.

According to Savini, UMass students pay approximately $1700 in student fees, which, he said is "one of the, if not the most paid by students in any other state university."

Gulko said that the University spent about$7.5 million on utilities, a figure which next year he expects to rise substantially. This exceeded the estimated utility cost, arrived at last summer. Due to the "dislocation of utilities", the University needs a subsidy in order to defray the costs. Gulko is confident, however, that the state will allocate the money to pay for this year's as well as next year's costs.

A final budget requires one and a half years of preparation. After drawing up a proposal, the University submits it for three reviews: first to the Board of Higher Education, then to the Secretary's Office and the Secretary of Administration and Finance. The proposal is amassed with those of other state institutions, and is incorporated into the Governor's budget, a document entitled "House 1". The House Ways and Means Committee reviews this document, which is afterwards passed on to the Senate. Usually, a Conference Committee must be formed to draw up a document which they both agree. This work is passed on for the Governor's approval and signature which finalizes the budget.

Netherlands Wind Ensemble

Celebration of melody

By DOROTHY L. MULLER
MDC Staff

When serious music was solemnly played, then somber muscians gravely attired in concert black, earnestly settled down to the night's concert business. But last night's performance of the Netherlands Wind Ensemble was a celebration of melody by 17 young artists.

Charles Gounod's Petit Symphony is a simple texture of melodic variations, more in keeping with the light theme of a serenade. Not that it lacks symphonic strength or richness, but rather it is relaxed interplay of intertwined and reiterated melody, completely in harmony with the easy stage presence of the young musicians.

There is a natural progression from the gentle, slightly melancholic melodies of Gounod to the classic melodies of Mozart (in his Serenade 12 in C minor) that turn upon themselves in a classic balance of diatonic harmony and clarity of form. It should be noted that Mozart is the precurser to the homophonic melody which characterizes Gounod's work.

Melody is of supreme importance in Chanson et Danses by Vincent D'Indy. It is through confluence of melodies that D'Indy achieves musical emotion; he loathed the musical pendantry of chords and reveled in the harmony of concurrent melody. If D'Indy appears to wander timelessly in his work; if the tempo is disconcertingly precipitated or slackened it is because he despises the tyranny of the bar line. And it is D'Indy's revolt against the musical "doggeral" of symetrical form, which renders the tremendous musical emotion which has become synonymous with his work.

Netherlands Wind Ensemble

The Serenade in D minor by Antonin Dvorak is clearly a return to the rococo serenade theme. There is hardly a more representative theme of melody exposition than this. The Serenade proper is a warm melodic lyricism but the finale in the finest serenade tradition is a lively elaboration of the opening melody of the first movement which abruptly abandons the C minor mode ending with a jubilantly triumphant D major. It is the culmination of melodic interplay dramatically closing an evening of the celebration of melody.

Amherst town eyes Transportation Act

By BILL GONET
MDC Staff

A group of citizens from Amherst and surrounding towns gathered Thursday night to hear Robert Murphy of the Mass. State Department of Transportation explain the ramifications of the newly passed Regional Public Transportation Act vis-a-vis the community of Amherst.

The act, recently passed by the state legislature, outlines the mechanism for establishing and operating regional mass transit systems. A concommittant legislative study has designated the Pioneer Valley region, along with nine other regions, as a prospective candidate for this system. Comprising the Pioneer Valley Region are 15 communities of which Springfield, West Springfield, Chicopee, Holyoke, Northampton, and Westfield, are the most notable.

Under the provisions of the act, the transit system of each region will be administered by an advisory board, comprised of members from each of the participating communities within that region. In regard to decision-making within each of the regional advisory boards, each community will receive one vote and an additional number of votes reflecting the size of its respective population in relation to the total population of the region. Thus, Springfield would receive 21.8 per cent of the votes while Northampton and Amherst would receive respectively 6.1 per cent and 5.8 per cent of the votes.

Once established each regional board will plan the routine network of each respective system, set the fare rates, and will award the contract for service along the designated routes to a private transit company. Within the act are provisions for establishing different fair rates for different routes and for establishing free service along designated routes.

Financing for the initial costs of establishing each regional system will be subsidized by matching regional, state, and national allocations. Already 20 million dollars have been allocated by the Massachusetts state legislature to be distributed among the 10 prospective regions to partially cover the initial costs.

Overlooking the hemorraging condition of the state's ever-increasing deficit, the formulators of the act have been provisions that the state will pick up one half of the tab of the deficit costs incurred by the operation of each regional system. From past experience, it has been assumed that a mass transit system is unlikely to support itself. The remainder of the deficit costs incurred by the operation of each system is to be apportioned among the communities participating in that particular regional system.

The apportioning of the deficit costs of each system among the participating communities will be determined by the cost incurred along each route.

Each community will pay for the operational costs of portions of those routes which run through its respective area. Thus, communities providing free service along portions of its respective routes will face higher operational costs.

In the near future the 15 communities of the Pioneer Valley will decide whether or not to participate in the proposed system. To establish the system a majority of 8 communities is required. Those declining will simply drop out.

Under the act, the decision to commit a particular community to participation within the proposed system rests with the mayor or the chairman of the board of selectmen of that particular community. However, once committed to the system, any community can withdraw if it finds its interests are being overlooked or threatened by the decisions of the regional advisory board.

During the question and answer period which followed Murphy's explanatory presentation, it appeared many of the attending citizens were very skeptical as to how the state was going to be able to pay for 50 per cent of the deficit costs of 10 regional transit systems, especially in light of its increasing difficulties with the financing of the debt ridden MBTA. Likewise, other citizens appeared to be singularly dissatisfied with Murphy's inability to explain how the proposed regional system would affect the Five College free bus system.

From the response of Amherst residents present at the meeting, it's evident the state will need a great deal of salesmanship to convince the people the system is necessary and can work.

Boston Harbor closed

BOSTON (AP) — Boston Harbor was closed yesterday after scrap metal caught fire in two holds of a cargo ship docked at the Mystic River Pier.

The blaze developed, possibly by spontaneous combustion, in two of the five holds aboard the Galicia, a freighter of Panamian registry which docked at the pier a week agc after a trip from Spain, authorities said.

Deputy Fire Chief Leslie MaGoon of the Boston fire Department said no injuries were reported and there was no immediate danger unless the fire broke through to the ship's fuel, which he considered unlikely.

The fire could smolder for more than a week, fire officials said, and tons of carbon dioxide would have to be used to smother fire.

Campus Police seek new union— vote contested

By FRITS GEURTSEN

The police officers of the UMass Department of Public Safety are currently trying to change their union affiliation.

A vote was taken on Feb. 6, the outcome of which was to decide whether the 28 officers of the department would remain in Local 1776 of the AFL-CIO or join the International Brotherhood of Police Officers (IBPO).

Eight of the votes were contested by the University administration and so voting is currently being reviewed by the State Labor Relations Commission in Boston. The votes were contested on the grounds that the seven sergeants and one lieutenant who cast them should be considered managerial class, and not labor.

H.S. "Scotty" Overing, Coordinator of Labor Relations for the University, said "The reason that I contested those votes was that I felt the duties of the eight men clearly put them in managerial status. They have decision-making responsibility that someone of labor status does not have."

Officer Richard Guilmette

Officer Richard Guilmette, who has acted as the unofficial representative for his fellow police officers who wish to join the IBPO, said "We need a 51 per cent majority vote to change unions. The result of the vote was 14 for the BIPO, five for the present union, one for no union at all — and the eight contested votes. If those eight votes are considered valid and at least one is for the IBPO, then we've got our majority. If they're called invalid, then we'll have to vote all over again."

"The reason behind our desire to switch unions," continued Guilmette, "was that we didn't feel that our best interests as police officers were being seved in a union that represents the physical plant people, the dining comons workers, janitors, and so forth. It just doesn't make sense that one union could possibly be adequately representing such diversified groups."

"We're hoping to release the tenacious grip that the AFL-CIO has on this campus. They're the only union at UMass right now. this isn't a totalitarian country — there should be freedom of choice. I'm not saying that the AFL-CIO hasn't done anything good — they have certainly, but we feel we'd be better represented by a professional police union."

"The IBPO is such a union. We feel that it is an agency that engenders true professionalism and will better understand our needs."

Overing expressed amazement that the AFL-CIO does not have a special unit for police officers.

"Although it's simpler to deal with one union than several," he said, "we respect the wishes of any individual to be represented by whomever he wants. A variety of unions would cause more headaches, but this is not to say that it would be inappropriate."

Questions concerning the proposed union switch by the police, drew an angry response from Carol Drew, President of Local 1776 and vice president of the Massachusetts AFL-CIO.

"Of course the University doesn't mind other unions coming in," she said. "It makes it easier for them to divide and conquer the workers on this campus."

Referring to the IBPO, she said "The University has always been a political plum to maverick unions. This is not the first time that someone has tried to steal out members. And it won't be the last time. The AFL-CIO is a lot bigger and so has more lobbying power — and that's what you need."

Guilmette outlined the events leading up to last month's voting. "We filed our first petition for voting in November of 1972. It took more than a year to finally get to vote due to procrastination on the parts of bureaucracies at the state, University, and departmental levels."

"I feel the delay borders on a violation of employee rights. We can't hold any contact negotiations with Whitmore right now because this thing is up in the air."

A hearing was held last Tuesday before the Labor Commission, whose decision on the contested votes will be announced in two weeks. Representatives for the police officers, the University, and the two unions were present.

Guilmette said "We presented reasons why the sergeants and lieutenant should be included in the bargaining process, and not considered managerial. It seems irrational to me that sergeants should be considered managerial and still be receiving State grade 14 pay."

Overing refuted this, saying "The determiner in the managerial question is not grade but duty. We have several people in the administration who are considered managerial and receive less than that even."

"A lot of people are watching the outcome of this all," concluded Guilmette. "If we can break away from the union I'm sure other groups will try it too. Our main objective now is just to get this thing settled and not waste any more time doing it."

Poets Adrienne Rich and Robin Morgan will read at 8 p.m. tonight in the Campus Center Auditorium. During the reading free child care will be provided in room 105 of the C.C.

The two poets will conduct an informal workshop Tuesday morning at 11 a.m. in room 804-808 of the C.C. A complete schedule of the week's readings will appear in tomorrow's Collegian

Now that the vogue is back...

By BILL GONET
MDC Staff

"Esquire Magazine" in a recent issue said beer-drinking and fraternity membership are, once again, in vogue on campus.

Therefore, acquisition of an appreciation of "the hop" and acquisition of a pledge pin are two goals which should be earnestly pursued by those intent on being in the vogue. There are more serious and concrete reasons why undergraduates join a fraternity.

Fraternities provide their members with better food and more pleasing living accomodations at lower prices, more varied and more numerous social activities, as well as the character molding eatures inherent to any self-governing organizations.

However, for whatever reason one is considering fraternity membership, all who are interested share one common problem — the process of selecting the right house. For newcomers to UMass, unless they have previously established contacts with brothers of certain houses, the task of evaluating the different houses can be a confusing and frustrating experience.

Rushing activities, such as open house and smokers, attempt to acquaint interested newcomers with the general character and features of the respective houses. Between beers, hearty "how's it goin's", the brotherhood tries to put on its best face to the prospective recruits attending an open house party.

Hopefully, if one stays sober long enough to ask some pertinent questions and to evaluate the responses, he might get enough information to make a decision as to whether or not the particular house might be a possibility

However, in order to economize on hangovers resulting from attending 15 different functions, it is wise to assess the general characteristics of each house. Instead newcomers should call the Office of Greek Affairs, located in the Student Union. To the best of their ability the personnel will attempt to provide students with a selective list of houses that should accomodate particular interests and considerations.

Having narrowed one's choice of prospective houses to visit, one can best obtain an objective impression by simply dropping in uninvited. Once there, explain to whomever is present that you're interested in their house. At least a couple of brothers present will be happy to oblige you with a candid, ad-libbed question and answer session.

Gays in Maine

Out of the woods

Last week the Collegian interviewed GAYS on the UMass campus. What situation do the GAYS face at the University of Maine? Below is part two of the four-part series.

By BILL GORDON
The Maine Campus

Gay liberation has finally come out of the closet in Maine, and it looks like it is out in the open to stay.

A gay group began last semester at UMO as part of the Abenaki curriculum. Intended as an academic discussion of the social and psychological aspects of homosexuality, the small group expanded and turned from discussion to become an active gay social-support group.

Initial efforts to establish a meeting place near the UMO campus were met with opposition, notably from the Newman Center which refused to house the group because homosexuality is not condoned by the Church. The group also ran into opposition at Maine Christian Association, but eventually succeeded with a Unitarian church in Bangor. The group, called "Action and Support," meets each week in the large traditional church on Hammond Street.

Members say the group is the first of its kind in this area, and prior to it establishment homosexuals had no place to meet.

The group is composed of both male and female homosexuals. Three-fourths of the members are UMO students; the rest often travel several-hours distance to attend the weekly meetings. Numbers are continually increasing, and attendance runs from 25 to 50 gays for the newly formed group which has existed only a few weeks.

Most members say they joined for personal and social reasons. "It's just that when you're with other people who think like you," one girl said, "there is a bond."

"If you are in straight society and smoke dope, you know you can't talk openly about it. But when you're with friends, they know exactly know you feel."

Explaining what the group means to the individuals involved, one member, a UMO student, said it helped him accept himself even with the label "deviant" applied.

"I think I'm deviant. I don't go through a day with the same kind of attitudes, knowledge, and responses that other people do. I think that because I am gay I have an awareness that other people don't. I'm not suggesting any superiority - it's just a cultural thing. You get pushed and you respond differently."

The people who compose the group disprove the sterotypes created by the straight world depicting homosexuals as limp-wristed sissies or lesbians with butch haircuts. All could and do pass for straight.

Deception of the straight society, for reasons of self-protection was emphasized by the member who said, "One problem is exposure - whether anyone in this group wants to openly admit that they are gay. The fact is he probably would be leaving his job soon afterward."

They have adapted themselves to a world that condemns them, and now they have come together out of a mutual need to bring about their self-acceptance of what they are and admittedly have no desire to change.

States pass capital punishment laws

New capital punishment laws have been written in 22 states since a 1972 Supreme Court decision struck down the old ones as too vague and freakish. And President Nixon, alarmed over recent kidnapings, says he wants a federal death penalty for kidnapers who kill their victims.

Sixteen states already have new laws that could lead to execution of kidnapers and similar proposals are pending in 14 others. The 14 are part of 23 states where moves are under way to establish death laws meeting the high court's criteria for executing a criminal.

Arizona, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Louisiana, Montana, Nebraska, Nevada, Oklahoma, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, and Wyoming are the states where kidnaping can end in death for the kidnaper. Similar proposals are pending in Alaska, Iowa, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nississippi, Missouri, New York, Ohio, Pennylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia and Wisconsin.

While the details vary, the new death penalty laws and the proposed ones list specific crimes that can lead to death row and in most cases make it mandatory. In general, they apply in the commission of any crime wherein someone is murdered.

The Supreme Court ruled in July 1972, in cases involving Georgia and Texas that the death penalty, as imposed in most instances, was unconstitutional. The 5 to 4 ruling left the way open for legislatures to reimpose capital punishment, providing it was applied uniformly.

An Associated Press survey finds that almost 20 months after the decision, 22 states have new laws, 23 could get them, and five — Maine, New Jersey, Oregon, South Dakota and West Virginia — have no death penalty and no immediate plans for establishing it.

The court has yet to involve itself in a death penalty levied under state laws revised since its 1972 decision.

Most states have made the death penalty mandatory for specific crimes in order to eliminate discriminatory application. But some states provide alternatives.

Arizona's new law provides that a hearing must be held before sentencing to determine whether there were mitigating factors in a crime punishable by death. In Colorado, a proposed law would require a jury to first determine guilt or innocence. The same jury would then hear evidence on whether mitigating circumstances were involved in a death. If so, the death penalty could not be imposed.

Connecticut spells out possible mitigating factors, including the defendant being under 18, having deficient mental capacity or being under unusual and substantial duress.

Oklahoma has the most thorough law with a mandatory death peanlty for any first-degree murder, which includes killing a peace officer, penal employe, prosecutor or fireman; killing during rape, kidnaping, arson, armed robbery, or sexual molestation of a child under 16; killing a subpoenaed witness, the President, vice president or any official in line of succession to the U.S. Presidency.

Detente not to be stalled: Breshnev

MOSCOW (AP) — Communist party chief Leonid Brezhnev said yesterday that exiled Russian author Alexander Solzhenitsyn cannot be allowed to slow international cooperation and relaxation of tensions.

It was his first public comment on the Nobel laureate, who was stripped of his citizenship and expelled last month after weeks of attacks on his new book about Stalinist labor camps, "Gulag Archipelago." Solzehnitsyn is now staying with his lawyer in Zurich.

Brezhnev was questioned about Solzhenitsyn by a group of French newsmen who met with the party general secretary two days before a summit meeting with French President Georges Pompidou.

The case of Solzhenitsyn came up in an indirect way as the newsmen met with Brezhnev.

Brezhnev expressed regret at what he said were certain articles in the French press "which do not conform to Soviet reality."

Asked if he was referring to the Solzhenitsyn case, Brezhnev replied:

"No I wasn't. Besides this case, a great number of problems have been presented in a way which is not very objective. They have no relationship with Solzhenitsyn. Besides, I don't think that solzhenitsyn alone could represent the polcicies of an entire state.

GOP funds below '72 level

WASHINGTON (AP) — Ticket sales for the $1,000-a-plate Republican fund raising dinner March 27 are trailing last year's pace when the GOP failed for the first time in recent years to top the $1 million mark, sources said yesterday.

However, they indicated that revenue from an expanded direct mail program may enable GOP Senate and House committees to at least equal the total 1973 take of some $900,000.

Democrats, meanwhile, said their sales for a $500-a-plate dinner March 21 are running at least even with, and "probably ahead" of, 1973, when a take of just under $1 million produced their most successful dinner.

The two dinners are the major political fundraising activities for the 1974 congressional campaign.

Until 1973, the Democrats had consistently raised less money than the Republicans, partly because their tickets cost half as much.

However, in 1973 — in the wake of Watergate — the Democrats caught up. Although it is too early to tell, the same thing may happen this year.

Vice President Gerald R. Ford is likely to be the chief attraction at the GOP dinner.

Hearst message

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — Newspaper heiress Patricia Hearst, in a zape-recorded message which broke a long silence in the kidnaping case, has accused her parents of indifference and says, "It's the FBI who wants to murder me." She added, "I really want to get out of here. I ask you not to aid the FBI." The 20-year-old coed, kidnaped Feb. 4, made the statements in a tape received Saturday by a San Francisco radio station. The comunique came from the Symbionese Liberation Army which claims to hold Miss Hearst captive.

Price controls

WASHINGTON (AP) — Congress is divided on whether to extend all or part of the wage and price controls or let them lapse on April 30 when they are due to expire. The House Banking Committee, which completed three days of hearings last week on the economic controls issue, may block extension of any controls through a loose-knit coalition of conservative Republican and labor-oriented Democrats.

Ethiopian strike

ADDIS ABABA, Ethiopia (AP) — The Confederation of Ethiopian Labor Unions said yesterday it had reached agreement with the government on labor reform and pay increases, and was calling off its four-day-old general strike. The announcement appeared to signal the end of a two-week-old civil crisis of labor unrest, street violence and government upheaval.

Watergate seven

WASHINGTON (AP) — The seven men indicted in the Watergate coverup are forbidden to travel out of the country but are otherwise unrestricted as they wait for their trial in September. U.S. District Judge John J. Sirica imposed no bond as the men, all former White House or Nixon reelection aides, pleaded innocent Saturday to the charges against them. The judge ordered only that they relinquish their passports.

No talk on embargo lift

BY C.C. MINICLIER
Associated Press Writer

CAIRO, Egypt (AP) — Six Arab oil ministers met here informally for 90 minutes Sunday but did not discuss lifting the oil embargo against the United States, an Egyptian spokesman told newsmen.

Describing the Cairo meeting as "a family get-together," spokesman Salim Rizakallah said: "Certainly there was no discussion of the oil embargo."

The ministers of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi, Bahrain, Qatar and Egypt agreed to meet Wednesday in Tripoli, Libya.

Algeria, Libya and Syria — they did not come to Cairo — will be at the Libyan talks, the spokesman said. The nine nations which imposed the oil boycott against the United States and the Netherlands in October had been expected to consider Egypt's proposal to lift it and halt oil production cutbacks.

Algerian Oil Minister Belaid Abdel Salam said Saturday that Arab oil ministers were free to hold private talks in Cairo if they wanted to, but the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries would meet in Tiipoli on Wednesday.

Algeria and Libya oppose lifting the oil boycott at this time, although Egypt favors it in response to Washington's successful efforts in persuading the Israelis to withdraw from the Suez Canal front.

The energy crisis

Gas outlook divided after week's events

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Increased gasoline allocations, a presidential veto and hopes for an end to the Arab oil embargo marked last week's developments in the energy area.

Arab oil ministers had been scheduled to meet yesterday in Cairo and there were predictions that the 4-month-old embargo on oil shipments to the United States would be ended. The meeting was cancelled at the last minute, however, and a spokesman said another session had been set for Wednesday in Tripoli, Libya.

National developments on the energy situation included:

—President Nixon on Wednesday vetoed an emergency energy bill that Congress had passed the previous week after holding it since before Christmas. A Senate vote to override the veto failed. The bill had included a provision for a gasoline price roll back, which Nixon had said ultimately would mean reduced production of gasoline.

—The Federal Energy Office announced to a meeting of the nation's governors that gasoline allocations would be increased for March. FEO chief William E. Simon said Thursday that each state would get at least 85 per cent of its consumption in the March 1972 base period, with a national average of 89.6 per cent. The increases average about 2.9 million gallons a day, about one per cent over February.

—Southern West Virginia coal miners ended the second week of a strike mainly to protest a state ban on sale of gasoline to any driver with a tank more than one-quarter full. By week's end, strike leaders were urging the 20,000 idled miners to return to work for two weeks to give state officials time to resolve the problem.

—The House passed and sent to the Senate a bill to create a statutory Federal Energy Administration to replace the presidentially created FEO.

Energy chief Simon said Saturday that the end of the embargo would end long lines at service stations. But he warned that an increased flow of costly foreign oil would not necessarily stop the rise of gasoline prices.

However, it was learned as Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger returned to Washington from a Middle East trip that prices of Arab oil might drop to about $7 a barrel from the current 1.65.

It has been estimated that it would take at least a month after an end of the embargo for Arab oil begin reaching the United States. According to conservative estimates, the embargo has cost the United States about 10 per cent of its total need for 19 million barrels of crude oil a day.

CIA foiled in oil search

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Central Intelligence Agency tried last year to assess prospective oil sources abroad, and found it difficult, according to its former director, Richard Helms.

He said in year-old testimony made public Sunday that getting information from American oil companies about prospective prices and supplies "is one of the hardest jobs we have."

Helms conceded there was "an overwhelming amount of information" on foreign oil reserves, but that he had reason to believe it was not accurate.

Helms testified before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in a secret session Feb. 7, 1973, as he was leaving the CIA for a new assignment as ambassador to Iran.

His discussion of gathering information in the face of the approaching energy shortage was in response to questions about the operations of the CIA Domestic Contact Service.

The service, he said, contacts Americans upon their return from travels abroad. It also contacts the heads of companies doing business abroad.

The CIA-businessmen relationships are kept confidential at the businessmen's request to avoid a foreign government's reaction against employes, Helms said.

"It is pretty much a one-way street" and the businessmen "dictate the terms under which they are prepared to collaborate," he said.

Cronin advocates technology as solution to shortages

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

Massachusetts Congressman Paul W. Cronin (R-Andover) told a campus audience of only twenty-five Friday that the present energy crisis will be only temporary if the U.S. can properly employ existing technology to ease it's fuels use.

"The information that we were having an impending crisis has been available for some time," Cronin said, adding, "decision makers have been failing to make decisions" on energy.

The freshman congressman spoke as part of a mechanical and aerospace engineering department seminar series coordinated by professor Gabriel Horvay.

Cronin expressed support for the "feasibility" of the proposed government-funded Dickey-Lincoln hydroelectric project in northern Maine, said he favors the deregulation of natural gas prices, and outlined the two steps he feels are necessary to develop a "comprehensive energy policy."

"We're going to have to change the structure of our government at every level...and use the tremendous advantages that science has brought us." he said.

"Then," he said, "we need to develop the ability to use, convey and teach that science to humanity as a whole.

"I am optimistic and I'm convinced this temporary shortage is a springboard for good things in the future," he concluded.

Cronin also supported drilling for oil off the New England coast, but only with proper technical and environmental safeguards on the drilling rigs. He said oil companies are sometimes reluctant to take adequate precautions because of high costs but should be forced to by government regardless.

"If corporations aren't prepared to accept their civic responsibility to America, I'm prepared to impose it on them, and vote accordingly," he said.

Cronin has four House subcommittee assignments that involve energy policy formulation. He serves on the energy and the science and technology subcommittees of the Committee on Science and Astronautics. In addition, he is assigned to two Interior Committee sub-committees on mines and mining and on environment.

"Just a few years ago, Dickey-Lincoln didn't make any sense from a cost point of view," Cronin said. "Today it's very feasible...it has the capacity to provide us with billion kilowatts of electrical power every year."

Cronin said the New England Congressional Caucus, most members of which have switched to supporting Dickey-Lincoln, will report on the feasibility of the project and propose funding legislation for it within a few months.

Among three other speakers in the seminar series sponsored by the engineering departments will be Dr. Edward Teller of the University of California at Berkeley's Lawrence Radiation Laboratories.

Teller, a major contributor to the A-bomb effort during World War II, will discuss "energy resources of the future on March 22, a Friday in Hasbrouch 20 at 8:15 p.m.

Onassis now eyes two new sites after Durham defeat

By ROBERT MEDEIROS
Associated Press Writer

DURHAM, N.H. (AP) - Aristotle Onassis is looking at two new sites for an oil refinery after unsuccessfully spending at least $1 million trying to convince the residents of the seacoast town of Durham to accept New England's first refinery.

Durham, with its family farms and retirement homes, seemed an unlikely site for a $600 million refinery. About 5,000 people reside in Durham, the home of the 10,000-student University of New Hampshire.

Onassis, backed by Gov. Meldrim Thomson, announced last November that he wanted Durham as his site for the nation's largest refinery.

But the Durham residents voted against the refinery by an 8-1 margin at their annual town meeting last week.

The following day, the New Hampshire House rejected a proposal by the Onassis-owned Olympic Refineries Inc., that would have given the state the power to override local opposition in the selection of a refinery site.

Onassis' emissaries say they are looking at other possible sites in New England including the factory town of Newmarket, which borders Durham, and any town that is "ready to accept us."

The Greek shipping magnate also has commissioned preliminary feasibility studies for the Melville tank farm on a section of the abandoned Newport Naval Base in Rhode Island.

The tank farm was one of the largest Naval oil depots on the East Coast before the Navy decided to close the base as part of an economy program announced last year.

Newmarket is a mill town of 3,500 residents where the townspeople have become use to seeing industries come and go. They see the refinery as an economic bonanza to help make up for setbacks caused by the decline of the shoe and woolen industries in New England. The townspeople were the only seacoast-area residents to vote in favor of the refinery at recent town meetings.

The decline of the shoe and woolen industries in New England has been particularly felt in Newmarket. The townspeople were the only seacoast-area residents to vote in favor of the refinery at recent town meetings.

Onassis' aides are scheduled to meet Tuesday with Rhode Island Gov. Philip Noel.

State's landlord's peddle influence in legislature

..BOSTON (AP) — Many owners of rental property throughout the state will contribute unspecified, but apparently large sums of money to legislators who vote against extension of the state's local option rent control law this year.

The law, passed in 1970 is scheduled to expire in April, 1975, but rent control advocates plan to seek an extension this year.

The legislature's Local Affairs Committee on April 10 will consider about 30 bills to extend the law for from two to five years.

The Greater Boston Real Estate Board's 1,500 member Rental Housing Association has been told by its president, Rudy Fleischhacker that property owners will be asked to provide personal checks for the organization's new "political action committee;" these funds will be turned over to "the industry's friends."

In the Rental Housing Association's Bulletin, Fleischhacker is quoted as saying, "For years unions and other powerful groups have used this method. Although we will comply with recent legislation concerning political campaigns, we still will not be shy in our support of friendly candidates."

"Like it or not," Fleischhacker continued, "our fate in this industry rests with our friends in city councils, the state legislature and the U.S. Congress.

"If we are there to support them when they need us, we make their job a bit easier."

Michael Faden, an attorney with the Massachusetts Law Reform Institute, which supports an extension of rent control, said "that candor is shocking."

He said "the law can be extended, but it will be a major fight."

The 1970 law allows rent control of all cities, plus towns with populations of 50,000 or more. At present, Boston, Brookline, Somerville, Cambridge and Lynn have rent control.

Richard Frankovich, assistant managing director of the Rental Housing Association, said last week that "chances for outright extension of the law are diminishing every day. Tenants are not as organized or as outraged as they were in the late Sixties."

Frankovich said the Rental Housing Association favors legislation that would allow "rent review boards," as a replacement for rent control.

GOP 'shivering'

BOSTON (AP) — Republican members of Congress are "doing a lot of shivering," about their political futures U.S. Rep. John J. Moakley, (D-Mass.) said yesterday.

Moakley made the comments on WEEI's Bay State Forum.

"Many Republicans confide to me privately that the Ohio and Michigan Congressional races are very bad omens," he said.

"The longer Richard Nixon stays in office the more Republican Congressmen are going to go by the wayside," Moakley said.

Yankee upheld

VERNON, Vt. (AP) — The Appeals Board of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission's Safety and Licensing Board has upheld the full operating license of the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant.

Albert Cree, chairman of the board of the Vernon electric generation company, said last week, "It leaves us in a better position than we've been in before in this licensing procedure."

Midnight strike

BOSTON (AP) — About 3,000 heavy equipment operators employed on construction projects in Eastern Massachusetts were scheduled to go on strike at midnight last night.

The strike concerns a dispute over wages and working conditions in a new contract. The old one expired Feb. 28.

Industry spokesmen said the strike could affect an estimated $1 billion worth of construction projects. The strike was called by Local 4, Operating Engineers Union, AFL-CIO.

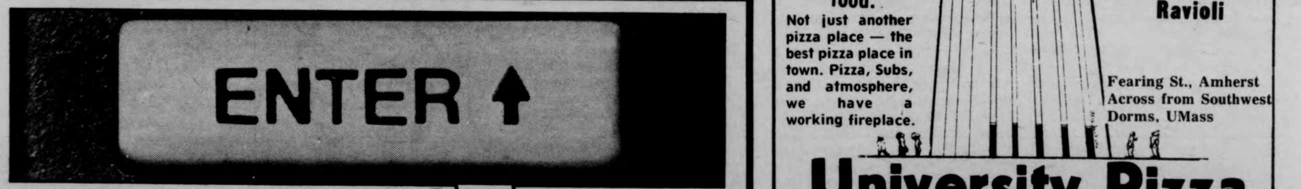
The walkout was to affect crane and bulldozer operators, scrapers, hot top rollers, steam shovel operators, oilers and others who operate elevators and hoisting equipment.

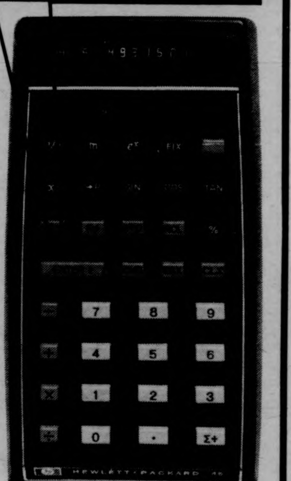
Ski woes

PITTSFIELD (AP) — The president of the Massachusetts Ski Area Association said last week his group has requested federal financial assistance in the wake of one of the worst ski seasons ever.

Paul R. Bousquet, owner of the Bousquet Ski Area here, said the group has requested that ski areas be granted guaranteed loan status by the Small Business Administration.

At the association's request, Rep. Silvio O. Conte, (R-Mass.) has filed legislation that would provide low interest, long term government loans to operators, Bousquet said.





This is your key to unprecedented calculating capacity. Only Hewlett-Packard offers it.

It lets you "speak" to your calculator with total consistency, because it lets you load data into a 4-Register Stack. This means: (1) you always enter and process your data the same way, no matter what your problem; (2) you don't have to re-enter data; (3) you can see all intermediate data anytime.

Our HP-45 is one of two pre-programmed scientific pocket-sized computer calculators with this key. That's one reason it's the most powerful pre-programmed pocket-sized scientific computer calculator. Here are three of many others:

1. It's pre-programmed to handle 44 arithmetic, trigonometric and logarithmic functions and data manipulation operations beyond the basic four (+, −, ×, ÷).

2. It lets you store nine constants in its nine Addressable Memory Registers, and it gives you a "Last X" Register for error correction or multiple operations on the same number.

3. It displays up to 10 significant digits in either fixed-decimal or scientific notation and automatically positions the decimal point throughout its 200-decade range.

Our HP-35 is the other. It handles 22 functions, has one Addressable Memory Register and also displays up to 10 digits in either fixed-decimal or scientific notation. It's the second most powerful pre-programmed pocket-sized scientific computer calculator.

Both of these exceptional instruments are on display now. If you're looking for unprecedented calculating capacity for your money, by all means see and test them.

Women in Careers

By SUSI KRIVATSY
DON BANKS
Collegian Cotnributors

Once upon a time by going to college a woman deviated from acceptable standards. Later, the woman who finished a graduate degree or built a career on her college education was the deviate. Today, college women are common phenomena, and certain graduate schools and professional fields are flooded with women applicants. It seems like things have changed a lot, mainly because generations of women started considering jobs and careers as viable alternatives for self expression.

However, whether you or any woman holds a job or a career makes a difference. A woman's (or man's) first decision is whether she wants a mere succession of jobs or a career. Webster defines "career" as "a course of continued progress...a profession for which one trains and which is undertaken as a permanent calling." Regardless of education or competency level from which you enter the professional world, you must consider where you are headed--whether to take dictations or dictate the letters, prepare the food or manage the restaurant, operate a machine or run the factory, prepare blood slides or head the research lab.

"Career" involves progression and development, and unless you know what to aspire to, your jobs and professional growth will be haphazard at best. Typically, you will spend your working year going from job to job, with the minimal salary increases. If this pattern is acceptable to you, then with some basic secretarial or technical training you enter the work force. On the other hand, if you want a career, you must be prepared to devote time and effort to planning and pursuing it.

Chances are that in school you had the opportunity in all areas of the curriculum to equal or surpass the male segment of the population. Your grades were determined largely by the effort you put into achieving them and your success and failures were your own responsibilities. With some exceptions, this is the same in the professional world, which ostemsibly re-recruits and promotes on merit, not on race or sex.

Streaking: perversion, bafoonery

To The Editor:

UMass means a social atmosphere, which may appear to some, as a playground for pot smoking, partying, and of late, perversion. Four out of the last five nights in Southwest have been studded with streakers. It is becoming a regular evening activity of many men and an occasional woman. (last night there was a streaking couple-how cute!). Whenever the streakers are out, so are crowds of people cheering them on: and the police, who can be seen lined up on either Fearing St. or Sunset Ave. to become spectators of this bafoonery. I understand why the police have been unable to put a stop to this activity. It would be quite a scene to see a police officer chasing a nude body around campus, to say nothing of the flack they'd get from the crowd. The fact is, that these streakers are breaking the law and can be arrested and fined for indecent exposure (personally I don't find it indecent, rather pathetic). What I don't understand is why the Goddamn people continue to flock outside to watch and cheer these bare-assed bafoons. Where are their heads at? The spectators scream, applaud, throw firecrackers and waterballoons as they gather outside or stand with noses pressed against windows to get into what's happening. It is not proving anything, particularly by hanging out of windows nude!

Some people are at this University to learn which, for some, includes studying. The noise pollution coming from these latent exhibitionists and their followers makes this very difficult.

Perhaps the priorities of Southwest, along with combatting racism and sexism, ought to include studying, to remind a few people why the hell they are here!

Something must be done before we are able to look up at John Adams or Kennedy at midnight and see a penis in every window.

Streaking: "normalcy", "traditional"

To The Editor:

Thank you, Mr. Johnston, for your insightful comments upon the "streaking" phenonmenon currently the rage on this campus. I'm overjoyed that you consider this a return to "normalcy" (sic) of traditional student behavior. I, also, am glad to see a "return to the fifties and fun." The late state of consciousness that epitomized the student of the latter part of the sixties was indeed "too serious" and "humorless" lately. The only streaking done during those "abnormal" times for student behavior was done by veterans on their crutches and wheelchairs and Vietnamese children with burning napalm on their bodies. If it hadn't been for those "crazies" (not the bomb throwing type) running around with their clothes on and protesting against such things as the draft, the South Vietnamese people's fight for freedom and the so-called "rights" of minority groups, our country would not be in its current state.

So, Umies, keep up the good "streaking" and be reinforced in the thought that you are supported by your Director of Public Safety as you continue your "forward Streak into the Past" of the nostalgic Fifties.

Ronald Betts

Streaking: just freedom from clothes

To The Editor:

Streaking is important according to Peter Peterson because it shows that people are upset with society and want a change. I agree that people are upset with society and a change is needed, but what does streaking have to offer? Does it offer the freedom it has been said to? Are people simply looking for a freedom from their clothes?

I don't believe that streaking is going to help society in the least, but society does need help. Could there be another solution? Is it possible that God has already provided an answer? Has anybody heard about Jesus Christ?

Societies have come and gone and their problems have changed, but an unalterable answer remains. Jesus Christ, the long awaited for Messiah, came to earth some 2000 years ago. It because of His love for you that He died and it's because He is God, that He's alive today. This is how He can set us free and this is why we should allow Him to help us.

Back in the first century, the apostle Peter said to the people, "Save yourselves from this untoward generation." God is calling us to do this today. He is offering us an answer the problems which are gripping society. It is our part to ask the question and make a decision. Do you want to be truly free?

Elizabeth Wallace

Streaking: an escape from responsibility

To The Editor:

It makes me very sad to see "streaking" becoming the obviously popular sport that it is. Why is it that one can see 200 naked people jogging across campus, stirring up innumerable dorm residents and townspeople (till all hours of the morning), when just two years ago one couldn't get fifty people in a room together to plan protests against the mining of Haiphong Harbor? Why is it that when people are dying in an unjust war people on this campus don't "have time" to show their concern, but now, suddenly, they have the time to go out and joggle their "privates" in thirty degree weather? What saddens me and scares me is that this has been interpreted as a "change back to normalcy" and a "return to traditional student behavior". Is this implying that those who cared enough to demonstrate at Westover, Washington, Wounded Knee, etc., those who care enough now to boycott non-union grapes and lettuce, and those who care enough to give of their time at Belchertown, etc. are all somehow "abnormal" because they should concern themselves with something so "untraditional"?

I shall never forget standing in a lounge on Orchard Hill and hearing Prof. Luther Allen presenting a problem to the people there, who were considering committing civil disobediance at Westover Air Force Base in protest of the mining of Haiphong Harbor: He asked how, in good conscience, we could answer our children or grandchildren when they asked us, "Where were you when the mines went off?".

Could we dare to say that we were "streaking"?

Streaking: no need for shrinks

To The Editor:

The article appearing in Monday's Collegian about streaking was all well and good, but I think bringing psychologists into it and printing that close-up of a streaker is completely missing the point. I know you can't print every incident of streaking, since each day there are more and more. It's just that I'd like to define "streaking."

Streaking is just what it appears to be. "Simple." There aren't any gimmicks involved such as in putting one's clothes on in the morning. Bareass! So there's no need for psychologists to go into a vast study of human nature. Half these Goddamn streakers are just exhibitionists. Certainly, calling a radio station in advance is just a need for attention. Dangling on statues for a college audience is like going to a nudist colony with a hard-on. Streaking is done secretly, appearing fast and fleeing.

A few of my friends streaked earlier in the winter. And when done in the cold it is called a polar-bear attack, the real name given to streakers. I know what I am talking about because a friend and I "ran" through Campus Center Friday night. This isn't so great but it is one of the more ballsier stunts pulled at UMass. Running through a church or past old ladies is my idea of a Gold Medal Streaker.

McGilvray: typically cynical

To The Editor:

I'm sick to death of reading letters downgrading that "racist, sexist" McGilvray and please God may this letter be the last letter I read on the subject.

But I had to write to ask what is happening to our sense of humor? What is making us so sensitive that we are no longer able to laugh at or with ourselves? The nature of today's humor is cynical. How many of your have cracked a joke at the expense of a friend and had the friend laugh? Everyone. This is because he knows you and knows you mean no harm. What makes you think McGilvray has no sense of hunor — he just broadened it include the school instead of keeping it on a personal level.

We must stop being so sensitive — this only stems from suspicion and distrust of others, two social diseases running rampant on this campus.

Did you see the depiction of the prof. in Tuesday's MDC? Of course we all know there's no one on campus who looks that bad but you get the idea. I doubt that we'll have many teacher's writing in because of that "vocationalist" pig McGilvray.

By definition, a cartoon takes an aspect of a person-place-thing and satirizes this — purely for humor, or it isn't a cartoon.

I think that his cartoons are usually pretty funny. So next time you read him, don't think the worst — he's just got the typical, cynical sense of humor.

Susan Fernald

UMies: a good laugh

To The Editor:

In response to the harsh criticisms of McGilvray's "UMies", I'd just like to let those critics know that cartoons can make serious situations take on a humorous note without degrading those involved, if those involved would see beyond their own selfishness of trying to let everyone see them as high in status and intelligence. Anyone who can't laugh at himself and who is afraid of what others may say about him or her, knowing inside themselves that the humor depicted isn't a true perception of reality, must have a real psychological hangup.

I don't think "UMies" is written to degrade; it is written to give up a good laugh at ourselves.

Dick Powers

McGilvray: a lighter look

To The Editor:

Unfortunately when something controversial appears on the pages of the Collegian, everyone and his brother treats it as a worldwide issue. Of course I am referring to the now infamous cartoon drawn by Don McGilvray concerning Chancellor Bromery. I would also like to refer to the letter written by Cindy Rogers appearing in Tuesday's paper.

I take it that Ms. Rogers was offended by some of Mr. McGilvray's cartoons. So now I quote a paragraph from that letter: "His topics seem to rely on his base knowledge and opinions of sex, drugs and racism and if this is all of which he is aware, then I feel sorry for him as a human being."

I feel sorry for you Ms. Rogers because you obviously don't have a broad mind. Let me tell you something which I have a feeling you're not ware of. The name of the comic strip is "UMies." A UMie is a UMass student, just like you and me. And what does a student at this or any other college campus throughout this country see going on around him every day? The answer to that question is sex, drugs, and racism.

McGilvray is merely taking a lighter look at these things, just like Dave Berg does in Mad magazine. (or is Mad too beneath your dignity to look at Ms. Rogers?) Unfortunately we are living in a sick society when we can't even laugh at ourselves anymore. There are other more serious issues like the gas shortage which we should concern ourselves with.

So, Cindy, you know what you can go and do with that letter of yours?

Streaking and apathy

,'For every action,'' Kinley S. Herboldsheimer, my high school Chemistry teacher, often said, "there is an opposite and equal reaction."

One of the few things I remember from that class, I learned its validity through several car accidents, countless golf games, and an occasional back-biting swinging door.

UMass has extended the genius of that law to include the non-physical, and has been demonstrating it for a while.

I'm talking about streaking.

Though it seems like twenty years, I came to Amherst as a freshman in the fall of 1970. The activist movements on college campuses of the late sixties had peaked with the strike of the preceding spring, but the class that came to school in September was in its slipstream.

Left-wing organizations abounded, limited in numbers but vocal. While violence had never been a big thing at UMass, memories lingered and "protest" had not yet been relegated to use in disputed sporting events.

Fraternities and sororities were, we were told, places where remnants from the Eisenhower era hid; hanging moons a fond, but chillish memory from high school days; and panty raids the Edsel of college life, a seldom seen reminder of simpler times.

Appropriately, I came to UMass in the fall, when an era was ending, and I will leave in the spring, amidst entirely new circumstances. Like streaking.

I think streaking is stupid, although not as stupid as watching it, but it is a fad, and its importance lies not in the fact that people run around bare-ass, but that it symbolizes the new university student.

After living in limbo for two years, he is reacting to the sixties. Changing the world has taken a back seat to coping with the world.

Frats and sororities have come back, as people realized there was an alternative way of life; I saw a moon in the Collegian the other day; who needs panty raids when you can get more basic than that.

I'm not saying it's bad, though an instinct inside me says colleges should be places of turmoil and conflict. Perhaps we have come to a time when the pieces of society that were strewn about from 66-70 have to be picked up and made back into something.

The prosecution of the Watergate scandals indicates that maybe this is so. Every dog has his day, and the day is coming in an era strangely different from when it all started.

I do hope, though, that the new way is not just a slide back into the apathy of the 50's and early 60's.

There's a lot to be said for apathy, in certain cases (generally in regulatory agencies like the police and government), but there is no place for it in a university. Apathy toward things within a university, like student government, classes, and marks, can be tolerated, for they affect no one but the student, but apathy toward things on the outside cannot.

Call it what you want, and like it or not, the things that streaking symptomize are a return to simpler days. If these simpler days indicate that students, and universities in general, are retreating into isolated towers where the cruel world and its realities aren't permitted to enter, then the action of the late sixties was a waste of time.

Society just can't afford to let so many people use its time and money to exist in an expensive playground and "make believe" living.

The cost is too high, the potential too great.

Elitists stay home

In an article in yesterday's "New York Times Magazine" Edward Hoagland posed the interesting question, "Where have all the heroes gone?"

Hoagland begins his article by describing the thrill he got from the New York Yankees during the DiMaggio era focusing particularly on Tommy Henrich, indeed a great clutch player that was never recognized in the record books.

Hoagland then talks briefly about how the assassinations debauched our spirit and left a hollow in our souls, where once lived the part of the psyche that let us love heroes.

Hogwash.

Mr. Hoagland looks desperately through the world to find potential heroes, Sam Ervin, Henry Kissinger, Ralph Nader, Daniel Berrigan, and Bobby Fisher are among his also-rans.

The trouble is that if one is looking for heroes in the world of politics and intellect the chances of discovering one are about as great as finding a filet mignon in a garbage pail. They don't exist, and there is no reason for them to exist.

People that need heroes are not the Lincolned, steak fed Chivas-Regaled affluent. They have enough of their dreams satisfied without having to idolize anyone.

People that need heroes drive Chevrolets that they hope will make it through another year, they eat Hamburger Helper and drink First National beer. (Or what ever is 99 cent a rack that week.) They work endlessly at mundane jobs and know they will never get anywhere far from where they began.

They have neither the time nor intellect to worry about Henry Kissinger's globe dashing. They can't get a vaguely vicarious thrill from Bobby Fisher winning a chess game when there quiet-time diversion is probably jig-saw or Monopoly. The political wars are meaningless to them, because no matter what elitist hot shots say, prices go up and quality goes down, lines get longer and shortages more frequent.

So where do they turn? Oddly they turn to where Edward Hoagland began his writing about the lack of heroes...to sports.

If men like Hoagland spent less time in their ivory towers they would know that poor people still have heroes. In Pittsburgh, a rough, crummy, dirty, town of steel workers, hero worship brought about the creation of Franco Harris's Army, a public cheerleading group that believed in Harris and the Steelers. When Muhammad Ali returned to boxing after a three year layoff for which there was no legal justification, the world turned out to see him, the black world with it's essentially poor background that is. When Hank Aaron hits number 714 it will be a victory for the oppressed. The white bigots who hate to see Babe Ruth's record shattered by one of "those" people, will have to sit home and complain. In Atlanta's ghettos there will be dancing in the streets.

There are indeed heroes and hero worshippers. In South Boston saloons on hockey night the roar is deafening...but unfortunately not loud enough for men like Hoagland and other New York Times greats to hear. You hear no cheers in moneyed suburbia, only the silence of forgetting where this coutnry is really at.

Words mean what they say?

By DENNY MATTEAU

Our Illustrious Leader had another press conference the other night. You know the guy I mean, the one who has contributed so much to the evolution of our language, completely changing the use of the term "perfectly clear", and creating inoperatives hither and you..."I'd call this a down-turn" he said. (jeez, and I had been worried, too, oh I'm so glad this is only a downturn!) Well, at his last press conference, the laurels for imaginative in operation went to a member of the press, a collegiate-looking gentleman whose name escapes me. The gentleman was asking a question about economics and used the phrase, "...consumers becoming disenchanted with inflation..." I must be a real misfit, because as a consumer, I was never enchanted with it in the first place.

When one considers that the quintescence of a university is, after all, words, winding windy weighty words, is it no wonder that we used to say the library was sinking? (I know, this is a non sequiter, but it's all in the spirit of the times.) Words make up language, or le langage, or la langue... "La langue is the French for the tongue and the French don't always distinguish between "tongue" and language" - So translate "tongue twister" directly into French and you'll get a twisted language...which brings us back to this university. In sociology this week I learned that "The Family Is The Legitimate Way to Found A Family.", and when another student, silly thing, thought she'd get a clarification of this, she got a repetition...far out. But as I glance back through the nuggets of Truth jotted in my notes, I see that the venerable Professor had clarified himself, after all. He said, and I quote, "If you're looking for common-sense definitions of terms used in sociology, you're not going to get your definitions." Ah yez, Grasshopper, harken to the wisdom...

Another student in another class wanted to know if an upcoming exam would be concept-oriented or question-and-answer, and the professor answered his question. "I don't like those terms." he said. And that is all he said.

Bye! Amherst Towing

It is not immoderate to assume that governments are created to take care of the governed, although at times the impression is that no such idea is in the mind of those governing.

The UMass Student Government Association will soon propose to the Administration a method by which that body can assume the responsibility of towing illegally parked cars.

The Collegian lauds such an idea and enthusiastically offers support to Rick Savini, Chairperson of the Rents and Fees Committee and that committee for their work.

Several questions concerning the implementation of a student towing service have arisen during discussion about the idea.

One issue, raised by Dr. Robert Gage, Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs was the possibility of towed cars being stolen, if they were stored in the Campus Center Garage. His fear is justified, except we feel that if a car thief was seriously interested in stealing a car why would he necessarily go to the Garage to do it? There are literally hundreds of cars parked in outdoor lots.

Further, if a thief wanted a car housed in the garage, and had the skill to steal a car, wouldn't it be smalltime for him to steal a ticket to be used at the exit booth as if he were the owner of the car anyway?

Gage also felt the public relations issue of student operated towing was worthy of consideration. He is right again, but it is inconceivable to think that anyone getting towed is going to get along in a brotherly way with the tower.

Getting a car towed is a pain...no matter who does it.

We are optimistic that a better relationship can exist between the tower and the victim. A student driver would not be so prone to charge a person for lifting his car and putting it down when the driver appears during the snatch. Amherst towing gets paid for this. it is parasitic and unnecessary.

Student towing will create a few more student jobs, which at a time that is seeing money for higher education hard to come by, become semi-precious.

Most important, the fee for getting a vehicle towed will go down. A decreased cost for any good or service in this age of outrageous inflation deserves a long and serious look.

To reiterate, we are in full support of Savini and his committee in this consumer-oriented legislation. We have confidence that they will satisfy Dr. Gage's paternalistic nervousness. We look to Gage to support student operated towing. Last, although the initial $20,000 expense sounds repulsive to senators forced to belt-tighten, we remind them that the money will be spent to improve the quality of life for many UMass drivers.

And that is the governors taking care of the governed, which is indeed not an immoderate assumption at all.

Last week Fred Weiss scooped Newsweek. Read his column on Tuesday when he discusses Richard Nixon's future and the Watergate aftermath.

For the people

"In the past year, this country has reeled as day after day stories of bigging, burlary and surveillance burst forth from the nation's capitol. For the first time millions of Americans are aware of an assault on personal privacy. Yet, in the long run, I believe the true danger lies not in the dramatic adventures of Watergate...but rather with the more persistent centralization of power in the federal government." - Gov. Francis Sargent; March 5, 1974.

Attorney General Robert H. Quinn made the following statement at a meeting of the Mass. Broadcasters' Ass'n. on March 5--

"There has been some misunderstanding concerning my position on the reporting of campaign finances. Let me take this opportunity to sketch briefly what I have done and what I will do regarding full disclosure of campaign funding information.

The new campaign finances reform act provides for full reporting of all campaign receipts and expenditures. My committee - Friends to Promote Attorney General Robert H. Quinn - has filed all information with the Secretary of State's office, the repository named in the reform law. In addition, although not required in the act, all contributions to the committee made prior to the law's January 1 effective date have also been filed.

It is also not required that the occupation and principal place of employment of contributors of $100 or more be reported. But I will ask my committee to make this information a part of my public report.

As for my decision not to join the campaign monitoring project of Common Cause of Massachusetts - under the new law, all campaign funding records will be open records - available to any citizen and to all civic groups. I believe that this information must be available to all groups not just one particular organization.

May I reiterate, firmly, what I have said time and again - the public shall have all information, not only that information to which it is legally entitled, but everything it is entitled to under those moral and ethical standards that I insist should be adhered to by any person in public office."

The Mass Caucus '74

By BOB MAC KAY

Final plans are being made by a non-partisan group of Mass. citizens to nominate and endorse candidates for certain state consitutional offices.

The Mass. Caucus '74 is being held Sat., March 23 at the Town Hall in Framingham. Registration is at 9 a.m. Those attending the public event will nominate candidates for Attorney General and Secretary of State.

Citizens for Participation in Political Action (CPPAX) and the Mass. chapter of Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) have both endorsed The Caucus.

Three candidates for Sec. of State - John Bussinger, Larry DiCara, and Paul Guzzi - have all agreed to recognize The Caucus. Endorsements received at The Caucus will be particularly noteworthy in light of the fact that there is no longer a Democratic State Convention.

The Mass. Caucus '74 is conducting a series of candidates' nights throughout the state. All possible candidates for Att. Gen. and Sec. of State are asked to attend, so that the public can directly question the candidates on the issues. A candidates' night is scheduled for Amherst on Thurs., March 21. The sight has not yet been determined - telephone 253-2635 for more details.

Harrington writes thank-you letter

Edward F. Harrington is a candidate for Attorney General. His office sent the following letter to Rep. Ralph Sirianni, Jr. (D-Winthrop) on Feb. 26--

Rep. Ralph E. Sirianni, Jr.
House of of Representatives
State House, Room 482
Boston, Mass.

Dear Representative Sirianni,

I want to thank you for your courtesy in failing to call me as a witness before your Committee which was conducting hearings on gun control legislation yesterday at Gardner Auditorium. The fact that you are a supporter of former Rep. Sacco for the Democratic Party's nomination for Attorney General and that I am an opponent of his, I know, had no bearing on your conduct towards me. (Incidentally, former Rep. Sacco was called out of order to testify by you.)

As the Attorney in Charge of the U.S. Dept. of Justice's Organized Crime Strike Force, I have faced every major racket figure in this part of the country and this experience in law enforcement has provided me insights which might have proved useful to your Committee. But the fact seems to have been disregarded in view of more important "political considerations."

My candidacy will offer to the people of Mass. an alternative to this type of cronyism which has long infected the politics of this State. Your act of political cronyism inspires me to continue to age a good fight against "politics as usual" and serves as a point of reference to exemplify that conduct which the public at large is fed up with.

I want to thank you for displaying political favoritism in the public forum for all to see.

Very truly yours,
Edward F. Harrington

The Amherst Democratic Town Committee meets this Thursday, March 14 at 8 p.m. in the Town Hall. Interested UMass students are URGED to attend.

The Air Force Pilot has it made. Air Force ROTC will help you make it.

Here's how.
If you qualify, the Air Force ROTC will give you free flying lessons. It'll be in a Cessna 150—you're started towards the day when you'll solo in an Air Force jet.
That's only one of the fringe benefits of the Air Force ROTC Program. Consider all this:
Scholarships—6,500 of them that cover full tuition. Plus reimbursement for textbooks. Plus lab and incidental fees.
Plus $100 a month, tax-free, to use as you like.

Want to find out exactly where the Mass. gubernatorial candidates stand on the issues?

Telepolitics, a WUMV-TV special production, presents gubernatorial hopefuls Carroll Sheehan (R) and Michael Dukakis (D) this week.

This Wed., March 13 Collegian reporter Earl Barroll interviews Carroll Sheehan. Following the talk, WMUA News Dir. Gerry Brooks and MDC Reporter Steve Seche question Michael Dukakis. Mark Vogler, MDC Political Observer, moderates both shows.

The broadcast is to be shown in the Campus Center Concourse next to the Coffee Shop. Airtime is slated at approximately twelve noon.

Telepolitics has announced that Gov. Sargent will be next week's guest. Attorney General Robert Quinn appeared two weeks ago.

IF YOU plan to be a doctor or a teacher... "For the people" has bad news for you...in a special report appearing in tomorrow's Collegian.

Hurting for money?

Hurting for money to make it through the rest of the school year?

If you're a first year, ful time student, you still may be able to get a Basic Educational Opportunity Grant. The deadline for submitting an application for the 1973-74 academic year is April 1.

Basic Grants is the Federal government's newest program of student financial assistance. Begun just this year, it is providing eligible students with outright grants of money to help see them through school. Grants average about$260 per student with a maximum of $452.

So if you need money for your education, look into Basic Grants. Get an "Application for Determination of Family Contribution" from your school's financial aid officer or write to Box 84, Washington, D.C. 20044. Then fill the application out and mail it by April 1 to B.E.O.G., P.O. Box B, Iowa City, Iowa, 52240.

Within a few weeks you will be notified whether or not you are eligible for a Basic Grant this year. He will determine the actual amount of your Basic Grant.

The money can be used to help pay for tuition, fees, books, housing, meals and other miscellaneous expenses.

Next year Basic Grants will be extended to second-year as well as first-year students. The amount of an average grant will be increased to about $450 with a maximum of around $800. Application forms for the 1974-75 school year will be available after mid-April from student financial aid officers at colleges, universities, vocational and technical schools or from Box 84, Washington, D.C. 20044.

FOR FURTHER INFORMATION CALL: Jeanne Park, 202-245-7915.

Music in Deerfield

"An Evening of Eighteenth Century English and American Organ Music" will be presented at the Brick Church in Deerfield on Thursday, March 14th at 8:00 p.m. David W. Dangremond, organist of Amherst College, will be the principal performer. He will be accompanied by Lisa Compton of Smith College on the recorder and the flute. The concert will be presented as part of Historic Deerfield's Winter Lecture Series. The concert will be open to the public. Admission is free and all are welcome to attend.

Discover Room-To-Move

In the past Room-To-Move has been known primarily as a drug problem center, but in order to meet the needs of the student population it has with time expanded its resources and capabilities in many directions. Over the past few years there has been a constant trend toward interest in meditation and spiritual disciplines, and while some people do not view it as important, others find that it can indicate a serious search and unfold valuable qualities.

Members of the staff at Room-To-Move have considerable experience with various spiritual traditions and disciplines, and are always interested in discussing questions and concerns in these areas. As part of an effort to meet these needs a spiritual resource referral system was recently begun and will eventually contain information on all area spiritual resources. Students and community members alike are invited to stop in the center or call at 545-0400 or 0401.

Today's workshops

The Aesthetics and Humanities Program (Transdisciplinary Cluster) of the School of Education is offering a series of Workshops in the Arts as part of a new course exploring the role of the arts in basic education.

The workshops will deal with creative movement, creative dramatics, puppetry, music, environmental design, poetry, music and sound, and MORE, focusing on their role in the classroom.

The workshops will take place today through April 27, and will run from one session to eight sessions. For more information call 545-3197 or come to 225B School of Education. (Register in Hills S. 151)

Your Stop & Shopsworth is a Good Deal for you!

I've made my promise to talk straight with you, so let's begin with our Stop & Shopsworth slogan — what does it mean? As your store manager I'm concerned about the worth of your shopping dollars, not only low prices but quality and service as well. No magic formula, just a week-in, week-out way of doing business.

We back this claim with what we like to think of as the Stop & Shopsworth Consumer Charter, the foundation on which we build such programs as:

Our Quality Protected Beef Program:
At our Marlboro Meat Processing Plant, special equipment makes it possible to maintain uniform cleanliness and tight quality control. This allows us to regulate the aging carefully (and naturally, with no additives of any kind). We can guarantee that you serve meat at its peak of taste and tenderness.

Our private label foods:
The Stop & Shop brand has to be as good as the leading national brand or you won't find it on our shelves, but ours costs less. We'll put our cake mix against Betty Crocker, our detergent against Tide, but gelatin desserts? We haven't made one to match Jello—yet!

Our leadership in Consumer Affairs:
As far back as 1959, our Manager of Consumer Relations was concerned about improving communications between Stop & Shop management and the consumer. Just recently, we received an award from Family Circle Magazine for our efforts in nutrition education.

Most important, we listen:
In addition to a network of Consumer Boards that provide a constant communication link to our shoppers, we are here to respond to your questions and suggestions. Stop & Shopsworth? The point is we're listening and working to be responsive to your needs.

Where has all the water gone?

The three biggest water users in town — Amherst, Hampshire College and gigantic UMass — are soon to be hit with a combined $88,000 increase in water bills to pay for next year as the result of a special Amherst Town meeting Monday night which ended preferential rates for the three institutions.

The town meeting voted unanimously for a flat 34 cents per 100 cubic feet of water used and voted to eliminate the old sliding scale which had applied for large users. Under that scale, regular residential users were charged the full 34 cents while the big users paid less money per cubic feet depending on how much they use.

UMass's share of the increase has been estimated at about $74,000. Since the 1974-75 fiscal year budget proposal allows less than $9,000 for increased water costs, changes in the budget will have to be made.

H. Jack Littlefield, University planning director who now administers physical plant functions, said last night the budget office of the University "is revising their calculations and will advise the state of the changes" in the water rate.

He said such budget category changes are "routine" and are processed through the Governor's office. He added that the University is experiencing increase in coal and oil costs because of the energy crisis as well.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

I cannot help being charmed by the classical Gemini. Many persons complain about this native, pointing out annoyances with regard to Gemini's penchant for touching, talking, ebullient and restless.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Mystery, intrigue are featured. Mate, partner and money situation are to be seriously considered. Take nothing for granted. Do some personal investigation. Reject the superficial. Dig beneath surface indications.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Emphasis on relationships of a permanent nature. Don't play games with emotions. Stakes are high and could be "for keeps." Contracts, legal agreements and marriage are featured prominently. Leo and Aquarius could be in picture.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Regulate pace. Avoid excess. Work with those who are dedicated. Stick to principles. Eschew the sensational. You can gain solid results. Open way to services which aid great numbers of persons. You will obtain needed co-operation.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Good lunar aspect coincides now with creative endeavors, basic changes, dealings with those who have young, vital concepts. You will change preconceived notions. One you are emotionally involved with could make surprise announcement.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Be thorough, aware of details. Stick to task until it is completed. Build on solid base. Put together puzzle pieces. Complete picture is available. Refuse to be sidetracked by get-rich-quick scheme. Sincere effort now will pay dividends.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Roadblocks are removed. There is more activity. You make additional contacts, some of them worthwhile. Relative, neighbor could play significant role. Gemini individual figures prominently. Highlight versatility.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Financial indications are bright. You collect needed material, signatures. Taurus individual plays important role. Consolidate. Get "parts" in working order. Debt is repaid. Family member makes intelligent concession.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): You are able to perceive motives. Clarity can replace illusion. Cycle is such that you see what to do and are able to act in constructive manner. Pisces, Virgo persons could figure prominently. Take initiative. Make new starts in new directions.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): What occurs behind closed doors is likely to directly affect you. Special meeting is on agenda. You could be given additional assignment, overtime project. Motives may not be clear, but one in authority is in your corner.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Accent is on friendship, romance, desires. You get what you ask for--know it and be careful. One who whispers sweet nothings could lack substance. Finish what you start. Popularity rating zooms--more persons expect more from you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Study Capricorn message for valid hint. Accent is on career, ambitions, relations with professional associates, superiors. Be original. Don't merely repeat what others say or do. Your own style, ideas are of paramount importance.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Special study proves beneficial. Review lessons. Take nothing for granted. One at a distance communicates. You learn and decide. Travel is a distinct possibility. Catch up on calls, correspondence. Aquarius, Leo persons may be involved.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are intuitive, a natural teacher, capable of perceiving potential in others. Those with unorthodox interests fascinate you. You prefer out-of-way places. You are invaluable when crisis occurs. September should be your most significant month of 1974. Many born under Leo and Aquarius are drawn to you. If single, marriage is on horizon. Married or single, you could be in business of your own in near future.

VD DAY WAS VALENTINE'S DAY at Central Michigan U. That's what the instructor in health education reminded students about in a letter to the editor of the CMU Life, last month.

"Tomorrow is that special day for which all you campuses lassies and laddies have been waiting, VALENTINE'S DAY! It also seems appropriate at this time to remind all you lovers that it is VD dav. VD stands for VENEREAL DISEASE..." There's a killjoy in every crowd.

SPEAKING OF OBSCENITIES, they're cleaning up the computer center at Akron University, these days. An AP dispatch reports that the computer used by students there has been programmed to demand an apology from any student who types obscene instructions and four-letter words into the machine.

If the student refuses to apologize, the computer turns itself off.

Which proves that even a machine can't compute if it is turned off.

EVALUATION of faculty by students and administrators isn't new. Evaluation of students by faculty isn't new. But there aren't many campuses where the Administration is evaluated by both faculty and students. The Maneater newspaper of the University of Missouri suggests it be done there to "provide a clue as to where things have been going wrong and why this University has not developed into the haven of quality it should be."

The editors are supporting a faculty request that "a critical evaluation of the university's administrative structure and of its impact on educational policy be made."

Which seems only fair.

WHAT A NICE THING FOR ENGLISH TEACHERS TO DO...at UDenver, three English Dept. instructors are on duty for stated periods every day of the week to help students with writing problems.

The Denver Clarion says the tutorial program assisted 90 students with their compositions during Fall semester.

MassAction

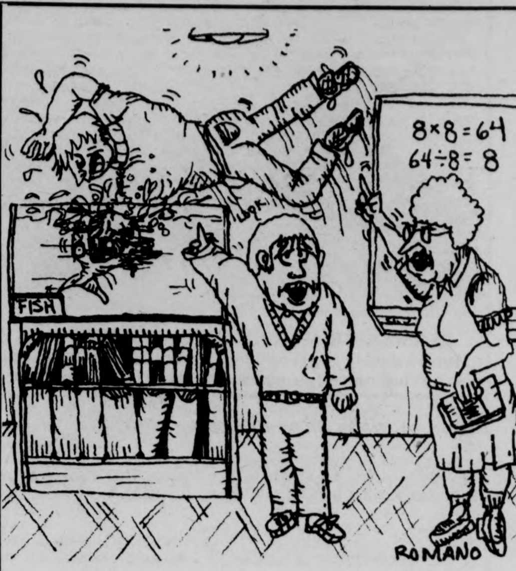
BOSTON (AP) — A newly revived MassAction, a citizen lobby, today called on gubernatorial candidates to speak out on such issues as waste and unethical conduct in state government.

Albert E. Anderson, MassAction chairman, said that the group has picked up some 400 new members in recent months, bringing their total membership to 2,000. He also announced that a co-founder and president of the organization, Sam Tyler, has resigned that post and will become a director of the organization.

The Sunday news conference was the first held by the group in more than three months.

Anderson said that five potential gubernatorial candidates -- Gov. Francis W. Sargent, Atty. Gen. Robert H. Quinn, Michael Dukakis, Peter Fuller and Carroll Sheehan — have all been sent questionnaires asking how each would handle four issues dealing with political ethics.

Anderson said it is just as important for politicians to deal with questions of ethics and waste in government as it is to deal with "big issues" such as welfare, taxes and the energy crisis.



Lawrence, how many times do I have to tell you to leave that poor fish alone!

Give till it helps.

Communist block sweeps golds in '74 world ice skating

By DAVID MINTHORN
Associated Press Writer

MUNICH (AP) — America's Dorothy Hamill was the new star of women's freestyle skating Sunday but Christine Errath of East Germany wore the world crown as the 1974 World Figure Skating Championships ended with a Communist bloc sweep of major gold medals.

Miss Errath, a 17-year-old East Berliner, won the women's crown Saturday night, edging the 17-year-old Miss Hamill as partisan and unruly spectators marred the final competition at the Olympic Sports Hall.

East German's Jan Hoffmann succeeded Ondrey Nepela of Czechoslovakia as the men's singles champion. Russia's Irina Rodina won the pairs crown for the sixth year, skating with her new partner, Alexander Zeitsev. Ludmila Pachomova and Alexander Gorshokov won the ice dancing for the fifth straight year.

Miss Errath, fell on a triple toe loop jump combination during her four-minute freestyle finale but still pulled into first place overall by virtue of a strong showing in the compulsory school figures.

Miss Hamill was stunned by a chorus of boos and whistles from the crowd of 8,000 as she skated onto the ice.

Bewildered by the roars of the angry fans, the American champion from Riverside, Conn., looked helplessly towards the sidelines when her musical accompaniment failed to come on. Then she skated off in tears and was comforted by her father. About five minutes later she went back on the ice.

Despite the interruption, Miss Hamill skated sensationally, earning her first "perfection" mark of 6.0 from the British judge and 15 marks of 5.9.

"One of the judges - the Italian - told me he felt sorry for me, so maybe the incident helped me. Maybe I got higher marks because of it," she said later.

The final routine earned Miss Hamill a "small" gold medal for free skating as well as the over-all silver, the only U.S. medals of the competition.

Dutch champion Dianna de Leeuw, who lives in Paramount, Calif., won the bronze medal for third place.

Celts ko LA, 94-82

BOSTON (AP) — John Havlicek and Paul Westphal revived the faltering Boston Celtics from a 14 point deficit in the second half Sunday for a 94-82 win over the Los Angeles Lakers in a nationally televised National Basketball Association game.

The Celtics trailed by ten points, 61-51, late in the third period when Westphal came off the bench to fire two baskets in a Celtics rally that cut the lead to 61-59 at the period's end.

Havlicek tied the score with the first shot of the fourth period. After Gail Goodrich and Dave Cowens matched baskets, Havlicek broke the tie with a jumper to make it 65-63.

Pat Riley sank a free throw for the Lakers and Jo Jo White got a basket for Boston, then Westphal came in with three points and a 70-64 lead that was never threatened.

The Lakers led by 14 points, 57-43, in the early stages of the third period as Goodrich ignited them to a 17-2 run on Boston as the period opened.

The Celtics ran up two big leads in the first two periods only to watch them evaporate.

Don Nelson shot them in front, 18-8, in the first session, but with Jim Price gunning from the outside, the Lakers moved out 19-18 at the end of the period.

Nelson and Havlicek teamed for a 37-29 bulge in the second period, but Hap Hairston and Goodrich hit to bring Los Angeles within a point, 41-40, at half-time.

Dave Cowens led all the scorers with 24 points and Havlicek, who missed six of the last seven games with a leg injury, had 14 points.

Kassulke accepts paralysis

SPORTS

BURNSVILLE, Minn. (AP) - Karl Kassulke knows now he'll never walk again.

"I've finally accepted things as they are," the former Minnesota Vikings strong safety said in an interview at his suburban Minneapolis home.

"I kept thinking for a long time that I could lick this, but now it looks like I won't."

The 10-year National Football League veteran was injured last July when the motorcycle he was riding collided with an automobile. Doctors have told him he will be a paraplegic the rest of his life, paralyzed from the waist down.

"I took a tough blow," Kassulke said, "but I'm getting by pretty good. I feel that I can handle things a lot better now. As much as I can, I'm enjoying life."

Kassulke is keeping himself busy. He handles the public address system when his former teammates play in benefit basketball games and he's part owner of three restaurant-bars located in Mankato and Rochester, Minn., and Mason City, Iowa.

"The bars are the main thing I have going now," Kassulke said. "They're all doing well."

Kassulke has a degree in history from Drake University and wants to teach eventually.

"I thought for a while I would try to do some football coaching, too," he said, "but I think now that would be a little tough. I know that I could do the job in the classroom."

Let Henry make his own decision

To The Sports Editor:

I would like to know why everyone keeps butting in on the Henry Aaron matter. In my opinion it is not Commissioner Kuhn's business nor the business of the Braves' front office. The decision to let Henry play in Cincinnati is that of one person, and one person only - Mr. Aaron himself. If he doesn't want to play in Cincinnati, then he should not. But I'm sure it doesn't matter to Henry where he hits it just as long as he's enjoying the game and gives that enjoyment to the fans everywhere in the country.

Rick Mikolajesak

Thank you UMass pucksters

To The Collegian Sport's Editor:

The story of the UMass varsity hockey season goes beyond the after practice brewin' at Mike's and Barsellotti's. The '73-'74 hockey season was much more than some sweet diversions in Utica, New York. The image of this year's pucksters is lost when viewing John Binoski reaching over the boards to pick up his teeth during the brilliant finale against Vermont. This year's UMass hockey was a show of determination, a collection of guts far surpassing those left at the Springfield Civic Center after the Providence near-miss. There was Jimmy Lyons broken nose during the last three games. Steve Nims played without bendable knees at Colby. Mike Ellis played with a separated shoulder. So did Mark Sullivan and Dave Alessandroni. Brian Mulcahy's every game was played on injured legs. And on and on...

Guts, and for those few of us who dig the under-publicized and Blackhawk-like uniformed crazy bastards who risk their bodies for a small, inanimate piece of rubber, there were highlights: Mullie's dive across the ice to save a goal against Northeastern in the sudden death overtime; three break-away saves by John Bink against division-one Colgate; Timmy Howes' winning goal against Merrimack; John Muse's tying goal against Merrimack; Robbie Quinlan's shift against Boston State; Steve Nims deforming two Merrimack skaters; at the same time; Mike Ellis going for four games without a goal being scored while he was on the ice; Billy Harris' five points against Colby, out of six goals; Mike Merchant, a freshman, as the leading scorer; Kevin Connors showing his form as the best all-around player on the team with a super effort against New Hampshire, then ranked second nationally; and there was Chickie Rheault, who hopefully will be in the New York Islanders net soon, and who was everything a hockey player could be - Everything! And again, on and on...

So, congratulations UMass Hockey team - thanks for some damn good hockey out here in N.I.T. 'Emerald City'. You don't have the best fans in New England, nor the best rink in New England (and that includes Greenfield). You don't get the best publicity in New England, and you don't dress in the best locker room, and you don't have the best size or the best speed or the best stick-handlers or the best defense, but shit, you're the BEST FUCKING HOCKEY PEOPLE in the New England states - in the United States, even.

Leads UCLA past Southern Cal

Bill Walton is BACK!

By RON ROACH
AP Sports Writer

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Coach John Wooden has some bad news for UCLA's foes in the way of a record eighth straight national college basketball championship.

Bill Walton is back.

College basketball's 6-foot-11 Player of the Year as a sophomore and junior outscored and outrebounded the entire Southern Cal team for the first 20 minutes Saturday night, the Bruins romped to a 47-13 intermission lead and coasted to their 23rd victory in 26 regular season games, stampeding the Trojans 82-52.

Walton finished with 26 points and 20 rebounds — but he had 20 points and 16 rebounds at the half.

"It was one of Bill's better efforts," Wooden said of the man who made 21 of 22 shots against Memphis State in the NCAA final game a year ago.

Dayton, which upset Notre Dame last week, will be UCLA's opponent Thursday night at Tuscon, Ariz., when the Bruins will try to stretch their record to 37 consecutive playoff victories. The 36 have resulted in eight NCAA championship banners.

Walton suffered a back injury against Washington State Jan. 7. He wore a brace when Notre Dame ended UCLA's all-time record winning streak at 88 games, a one-point defeat the Bruins avenged a week later with a 94-75 shellacking when Walton scored 32 points.

Before games, Walton usually appears relaxed and jovial as he warms up. But at the Sports Arena, where 15, 387 fans were whipped into a frenzy by the closest Pac-8 race in history, Walton's lantern jaw was tight.

This game could have ended Walton's college career. It could have ended the Bruins' domination of college basketball.

While the Bruins took warmup shots, the Bruin band played "Jesus Christ Superstar." Walton paced back and forth, head down and his hands in his jacket pockets.

With the tip-off for the nationally televised game still about 10 minutes away, Walton was anxious. He made a hurry-up gesture to his coach.

"I knew that Bill was ready," said Wooden. "He wanted me to get the game started before TV was ready and we know you can't do that."

GOOD REASON TO SMILE. John Wooden was in good spirits after his UCLA Bruins polished off Southern Cal on Saturday night, automatically qualifying for the NCAA playoffs.

UCLA, NC State in NCAA CCA for Southern Cal

By KEN RAPPOPORT
AP Sports Writer

It's the NCAA for North Carolina State and UCLA, the CCA for Southern California and probably the NIT for Maryland.

Those teams were headed for those places after these results in college basketball Saturday night:

—North Carolina State beat Maryland 103-100 in overtime for the Atlantic Coast Conference title.

—UCLA swamped Southern California 82-52 for the Pacific-8 Conference championship.

The victories gave top-ranked North Carolina State and third-rated UCLA, the defending national champion, berths in the National Collegiate Athletic Association's post-season playoffs.

The loss sent Southern California to the College Commissioner's Association tourney for runnerup teams in St. Louis. Maryland, whose ACC is not part of the CCA setup, will no doubt be invited to the National Invitation Tournament in New York. The tourney historically invites two rufnerup teams from that league.

North Carolina State earned a place in this week's East Regional semifinals against Providence, which beat Ivy League champion Penn 84-69 in a first-round game Saturday night.

In other first-round action in the East, Pitt trinned Middle Atlantic Conference winner St. Joseph's, Pa., 54-42 and Southern Conference champion Furman defeated South Carolina 75-67.

In the Midwest, Oral Roberts turned back Syracuse 86-82 in overtime and Creighton topped Southwestern Conference winner Texas 77-61.

In the West, Dayton stopped Pacific Coast Athletic Association representative Los Angeles State 88-80 and New Mexico beat Idaho State 73-65.

In the Mideast, Notre Dame and Marquette scored first-round knockouts and established themselves as heavyweight contenders for the national title.

The Fighting Irish floored Ohio Valley Conference champ Austin Peay 108-66 and Marquette walloped Mid-American Conference king Ohio University 85-59.

Notre Dame earned a berth against the champion of the Big Ten, which still was a question mark after both Indiana and Michigan won Saturday and tied for the title.

Indiana, which nipped Purdue 80-79, and Michigan, a 103-87 winner over Michigan State, will meet Monday at Illinois for an NCAA playoff berth.

Tom Burleson burned Maryland with a season-high 38 points and Monte Towe put the Terps away with two free throws with six seconds left in the overtime period.

Burleson was named to the ACC's second team this year by sports writers.

NBA adds New Orleans

By F. RICHARD CICCONE
AP Sports Writer

CHICAGO (AP) — The National Basketball Association awarded Thursday a franchise to New Orleans for the 1974-75 season.

Commissioner Walter Kennedy said anine-man group headed by Fred Rosenfeld of Beverly Hills, Calif., paid $6,150,000 for the franchise.

Kennedy said the NBA board of governors will meet again within two weeks to consider further expansion plans for next season.

Whelan wins all-around

Whelan sparks UMass to near upset

By WALT POWERS

Gene Whelan performed one of the greatest strong-man feats in UMass sports history this past weekend and in the process led the UMass men's gymnastics team to a near-upset fourth-place finish in the Eastern Intercollegiate Gymnastic League championships.

To no sane person's surprise, perennial champ Penn State won the Easterns for the 17th time in Coach Gene Wettstone's career. But to the surprise of just about everybody, less than a point separated the top four teams and UMass, in a record breaking team performance actually led after three events. In one of the closest championship meets in Eastern League history, the Nittany Lions won with 161.55 followed by NCAA College-Division champ Southern Connecticut, 160.15; Temple, 159.65; and UMass, 159.60.

UMass, in a performance reminiscent of their dual meet against Southern Connecticut three weeks earlier, rode the backs of Gene Whelan's all-around victory and their most flawless team performance of the season to their highest point total of both their season and their history. Though their final standing, fourth, was the same as last year when Southern Connecticut was not a member of the league, their scoring, in all departments, was much higher. Their optional score of 159 was up six points from last year. Their compulsory score of 139.7, was twenty points higher than UMass had ever done before. Though they missed the magic 300 mark in the optional-compulsory totals by less than a point, the team's total was a whopping 25 points higher than anything they had done before.

None of this could have happened though, without the cooperation of Gene Whelan, who picked the final weekend to turn in his best performances of the season. Though Whelan is one the UMass' Athletic program's smallest athletes, few people would argue that he's not the strongest, considering that in two days he singlehandedly: carried the Minutemen to the strongest showing in their history, best the strongest gymnasts in the east to become UMass' first all-around champions, and rewrote the UMass record book in qualifying for five NCAA championship events, the all-around, floor exercises, still rings parallel bars, and the high bar.

The Eastern League championships which consisted of Friday's optional routines, were much closer than expected mainly because Penn State, who was supposed to obliterate everybody, broke on key events and UMass, who was supposed to score a decent, unspectacular 157.8, broke less than anybody else at the meet. The scores from Temple and Southern were low, but not unexpected. "Penn State, Southern Connecticut and Temple had more depth than we did", said co-Captain Jay Thomsen, "But we made less breaks than any of them". UMass was also the most emotionally prepared team at the meet.

"We were the most psyched up team there," said parallel-bar man Tim Beasley.

Senior Steve Clancy, another Eastern finalist, helped UMass to a virtual tie in the free exercises at 27.5 with pre-meet favorite Southern Connecticut. The Minutemen then won the pommel horse by .10 over Penn State, taking a lead that would hold despite minor breaks in the still rings event that followed. The Minutemen ran up their highest score of the season, (27.45) on the long horse vault, but South Conn (27.85) and Penn State (28.15) were spectacular.

UMass hopes for a collosal upset fizzled in the parallel bars however. This was the one event where UMass hit below potential. It would be very easy in retrospect to point out that, had Mass hit here, the meet would have been theirs. It was the one event that prevented UMass from executing, in the words of Tim Beasley, "The Perfect meet". Tom Dunn was philosophical about it, "every team expects to break at sometime during the meet," he said. UMass' score of 25.5 placed them third behind Penn State and Temple. Ironically, Gene Whelan's outstanding optional routine on the following day's individual finals of the parallel bars gave him his only individual victory of the meet.

In the final event, the high bar, UMass did well, 27.05, but both Penn State and Southern Connecticut were phenomenal.

Gene Whelan led from the start in the all around and was the only performer at the meet to escape serious breaks. His victory was sweetened by the fact it was only his third victory ever over his twin brother Jay. Jay from Southern Connecticut, finished second. No other UMass gymnast has even placed in Eastern all-around competition and only three other men have placed in individual events. Whelan placed in four.

Gymwomen "floor" Clarion in finale

By CANDY GROSS

The UMass women's gymnastics team ended their season on a high note Saturday morning as they overcame Clarion State College, Clarion, Pa., by a score of 100.30 to 92.05. It was a very commendable score by both teams considering that they had to compete at 10:30 in the morning.

Vaulting, one of UMass' strong events, wasn't as good as usual, perhaps caused by a problem with a cracked reuther board. Nonetheless, UMass won the event with first place going to Jeannine Burger's 8.85 and second to Linda Nelligan's 8.35.

The uneven bars brought a 'break' in the action when Jeannine Burger cracked the low bar while springing into a handstand. Both she and the last Clarion competitor has to finish their routines at the end of the meet. Despite this, Jeannine earned second with an 8.70. Anne Vexler swung ther way to a first place 8.80 and Clarion's Betty Cieply took third with 8.35. Betsy East, just edged out of third with an 8.3, had one of her finest routines until she touched out on her dismount, quite possibly costing her a tie for first.

The combined scores of the first two events had UMass leading with 50.10 points to Clarion's 45.90.

Balance beam brought top honors to Anne Vexler, leaping almost half a point ahead with an 8.70. Betty Cieply (CC) took second with 8.25 followed by Jeannine Burger's 7.80. It seems that once again the winner of the event was the beam itself, as it gave most of the symnasts nightmares throughout their routines, causing numerous falls.

Floor exercise was UMass' strong event as its two top All Arounders took first and second with the highest of the meet. Anne Vexler threw her best tumbling to win with a 9.30. Jeannine Burger, adding new difficulty to her already superior tumbling, captured second with an 8.90. Third went to Clarion's Betty Cieply with an 8.45, just edging Jodi Hitt's 8.40.

At Clarion, the winer in each of the four events is honored with a spray of flowers. In Saturday's meet, three of them went to Captain Anne Vexler with Jeannine Burger earning the fourth spray for her first place in vaulting. The All Around honors went to Jeannine Burger who scored a 34.25. Second place went to Anne Vexler's 33.85 and third to Clarion's top gymnast Betty Cieply, scoring 32.35.

Clarion will be competing in the Easterns as the fifth seeded team this coming weekend at Curry Hicks Cage.

University budget

Bromery, Wood oppose cuts

BOSTON (AP) — Top administrators of UMass appealed yesterday for restoration of budget cuts made by the governor and in turn were criticized for ignoring the legislature's intent.

Robert Wood, president of the university, called the cutting of $2 million from the budget for the medical school at Worcester "incredible."

"I can only believe," Wood told the House Ways and Means Committee, "that these proposals are punitive in impulse and ideological in origin."

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery of the Amherst campus, asking restoration of another $2 million to the $66.5 million recommended by the governor, for his campus said "without this restoration, serious dislocations and in some cases trunctions cuts will occur within our academic program."

Rep. Joseph D. Early, D-Worcester, noting that the Amherst campus had transferred $1 million from one account to another, said "You're taking fiscal autonomy and abusing the intent of the legislature."

"Last time there were more than 100 votes to repeal fiscal autonomy. It it's repealed it'll be the fault of educators," Early said.

Bromery said the transfer was made to fulfill comittments made to graduate student teaching assistants before the legislature appropriated the money.

Lamar Soutter, chancellor of the medical school, sought from the committee restoration of $1.48 million of the governor's cuts. He estimated at least 300 qualified Massachusetts youngsters a year could find no place in any medical school, and said reports of a national surplus of physicians by 1980 would not apply to Massachusetts since the state has too many specialists and not enough family physicians.

Pressed by Early, he said he thought the school "could manage" to take in 40 freshmen next year, the same as last year, under the governor's budget, even though that budget was based on 16 entering freshmen instead of 64 projected by the school. "But we shouldn't be able to open the teaching hospital," he said.

Boone attacks prison system

By LAWRENCE M. CARPMAN

John O. Boone, former Massachusetts Commissioner of Corrections and now the director of the National Campaign Against Prisons, told a crowd of 250 in Mahar Auditorium last night: "Rehabilitation is misused, corrupted and destroyed. Prisoners are recalled just like Chrysler autos."

Boone, in a speech entitled, "The Death of Prison Rehabilitation", said: "The present prisons accomplish nothing, except pure punishment. Prisons as they currently exist should be phased out," he said.

The former commissioner then outlined what he called "the triple jeopardy" syndrome of prisoners. First, a person is in prison for a crime.

"Secondly, Boone said, a person in prison is civilly dead. He is later forced to go through hostile job application procedures." He gave an example of a reform program in the New York state prison system training prisoners for food service occupations. He explained, however, that once prisoners completed they program they could find no jobs.

The third aspect of Boone's "triple jeopardy" is the rehabilitation philosophy. "Third is the sick model; he said, if you are sick, you must get well."

"Less than one per cent of the prison population is sick," Boone said. He cited an example of a prison that had 32 psychiatrists. "Thirty-two psychiatrists are too much — they cost too much," he said.

"Parole, Boone said, is the most insidious rehabilitation hurdle."

Boone, in citing the history of prisons, explained: "The Quakers invented prisons to get rid of torture, mutilation, and execution." Now, he said, we have put back the torture, mutilation, and "even execution", into the prisons.

The National Campaign Against Prisons is developing alternatives, according to Boone.

"Community schools and mental health programs should be devised," Boone said.

"The time for correctional change is now," he said. "A national campaign against prisons is needed, said Boone, because there is so much happening in our nation."

He cited Watergate, ITT, and the Vesco affairs as examples of what the nation is experiencing now.

Boone, in discussing the "apathy and complacency now ruling to prevent people from rising up to...rehumanize the nation" said: "We must do something in addition to streaking."

"The big issue generates around the question of social ethics," he said. "Social ethics is the business of every relflective citizen."

"Toilet paper makers, lock makers and toilet stool makers are the lobbies that make you, the taxpayer, keep paying $10,000 a year for each prisoner," Boone said.

In response to a question from the audience Boone said Governor Sargent "intends to do something right for reform."

"I see some good signs, he said, he (the Governor) vetoed the capital punishment bill."

Concluding, Boone said: "I see more community interest in Massachusetts than in any other state I know."

200 NIT-bound fans lose out on cheaper Amtrack seats

By DOROTHY L. MULLER

If you are one of two-hundred sports fans with $9.50 reserved group seats on Amtrack bound for the NIT's your're out of luck. Any student who still plans to use Amtrack to get to New York will have to make his reservations individually at the Campus Center Travel Service and pay the full round trip fare of fifteen dollars.

The request for a special train or 200 extra seats for NIT bound students from UMass was denied by the Washington office of Amtrack on the contention that the energy crunch has increased the number of rail passengers and there are no available extra cars. A similar request by Boston College for reserved seats was also refused.

Mr. Paul Merulo, temporary district sales manager, for Amtrack contends that the verbal agreement which Mr. Steve Lepow of the Travel Service, negotiated with his predecesor was strictly an agreement to "pursue possibilities" of accomodation. Mr. Merulo suggests students might make individual reservations on the Connecticut Yankee which originates in Springfield at 7:00 a.m. on Saturday. An alternative route would be the shuttle from Springfield to New Haven with a transfer to New York. However, Mr. Merulo could not guarantee the number of available seats. He also noted that although UConn has made no requests for additional rail service, the number of students bound for the NIT's could not be determined.

The failure of Amtrack to provide service has placed Steve Lepow of the Travel Service in the awkward position of refunding formerly reserved seats. "When Amtrack came soliciting they wanted a travel agency to sell tickets and promote business and now we get a bloody nose."

Nader to speak here during Mass. tour

By BILL DENSMORE
MDC Staff

Consumer crusader Ralph Nader will speak in the Student Union Ballroom here at noon next Monday, the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MassPIRG) said yesterday.

According to MassPIRG director Ronald E. Bogard, Nader will come to Amherst as part of a four-day whirlwind tour of five Massachusetts colleges culminating in a speech on energy policy before a joint session of the legislature Thursday March 21.

"Nader is expected to speak on fuel shortages and other issues including nuclear power development," Bogard said yesterday. The UMass speech is sponsored by the campus Coalition for Environmental Quality, the Institute for Man and His Environment and the University and State Communications Council, he added.

Nader is understood to be coming to Massachusetts to advocate strong state involvement and initiative policy-making in nuclear power development. Bogard said he will probably stress the need for student involvement in the nuclear power debate when he speaks on campus.

There has been some speculation that Nader would advocate a moratorium on new nuclear plant construction in the state as a test of the feasibility and legality of a nation-wide moratorium.

He cited three bills before the Legislature as possible targets of support by Nader:

—House 2373: calls for the final plant siting approval to be vested in the Massachusetts legislature rather than the Atomic Energy Commission filed by MassPIRG.

—House 2668: calls for the sharing of tax benefits for nuclear plant siting by all communities which will share the danger of radiation contamination in case of accident. Filed by Rep. James Collins, (D-Amherst).

—Senate 658: calls for the state dept. of public health to study the impact of radiation levels of nuclear power plants in the state and suggest licensing provisions. Filed by Senators John Olver, (D-Amherst), Chester Adkins (d-Concord), and Rep. Collins.

National Women's Poetry

Festival still in progress

Fay Chiang will appear among the poets in the National Women's Poetry Festival tonight at the Campus Center Auditorium. She is Assistant Director of the Basement Workshop and Asian American Resource Center. Fay Chiang is the student co-ordinator for Asian-american studies at Hunter College and on the co-ordinating committee of the Yellow Pearl.

Ms. Chiang herself has had her poetry published in Bridge, Envoy, Harmony and Yellow Pearl. Joanne Mayamoto and Nikki Giovanni have provided poetic reference points for her writing.

Accompanying Fay Chiang for this presentation of readings will be Mari Evans who wrote I am a Black Woman, and Merle Okada, in the Campus Center at 8 p.m. Child care is available in room 105 of the C.C.

Tuesday 3-12, 11 a.m., informal workshop with Ms. Rich and Morgan, Rm. 804-808 Campus Center. 3 p.m. Carolyn Rodgers and Pineapple Whitcomb, Campus Center Auditorium. 8 p.m. Mari Evans, Susan Sherman, Tomia Arai, Nerle Okada and Fay Chiang, child care for all 3 events-Rm. 105 Campus Center.

Wednesday 3-13, 11 a.m., informal workshops with Ms. Sanchez, Rodgers, Whitcomb, Evans, Sherman, Arai, Okada and Chiang, Rm. 168-70 and Rm. 165 Campus Center. 3 p.m., Marge Piercy, Audre Lorde and Shirley Kaufman, Campus Center Auditorium. Child care for morning and afternoon-Rm. 105 Campus Center.

(8 p.m. — Gwendolyn Brooks and Mari Evans will participate in an evening honoring Paul Robeson—SBA 120)

Amherst College symposium advocates black business power

By MARK KELLEHER

Speaking last Friday at Amherst College's Black Business Symposium Ken Guscott, president of Guscott Assoc. and a governor of the Federal Reserve Bank in Boston, stated that, "blacks have a great future if we know how economics work."

Speaking on the realities the black businessman face today, Guscott said, "rapping is cheap, now is the time to take philosophy, put the pieces together and come out with a product."

The development of black business enterprises has been hindered, Guscott said, "by a lack of access to the marketplace. Business today is not conducted in the public forum but rather on the golf course, or the social club, making it difficult to share in the opportunity for information, we vitally need."

How is access to the marketplace gained? "Not separatism, it's a cop-out, a defense mechanism. We must get out and compete with the big boys," Guscott said.

He went on to say that black people must analyze what the Arabs have done. Power and monetary policies are shifting and we must be willing to deal with the following realities:

1. That black people realize the power Vector can be shifted with the wise use of resources. A case in point is the 40-50 billion dollar economy of Black America.

2. Institutional racism: Guscott remarked how he had compiled a "directory of minority businesses" in New England as a marketing tool to help the minority businessman. Until that time the large companies didn't know how to reach the minority businessman.

3. Stop kidding ourselves about business: "It's only natural to be uptight about things we don't know but we must be honest with ourselves to deal with business."

4. Manipulation: Of young blacks by (a) white people and (b) black people.

5. The failure to plan and do homework: You must know your opposition and that includes both financiers and the people you may be buying the business from.

6. The problem of ourselves: "The number one problem is jealousy." This can only be understood when one realizes that this is natural for newly emergent groups. It is borne out and caused by frustration.

7. Integrity: There is no chance of financing if your name can be associated with drugs. Also Guscott warned against the dangers associated with the black front.

Some of the positive things Mr. Guscott mentioned was his belief that the cities will be rebuilt.

"They are prime locations," Guscott said, and as evidence he pointed to the reversal of Boston's downward trend in population.

In sharp contrast to the housing construction failures of the late 60's minority businessman are now finishing projects before contract time and also below the budget. As an example he pointed to the Hotwell Terraces project in the Grove Hall section of Roxbury.

For future directions Guscott emphasized the acquisition of proper skills and training and the development of role-models in the black community to enable young blacks to compete.

Shhh! A quiet dorm is being organized

By AVIS YUNI
MDC Staff

Sign-up sheets for all students interested in living in and-or working on the organization of a "quiet dorm" will be in the CASIAC office, E-22 Machmer, this week, March 11th-15th.

Ms. Ann Marie Plaziak, Treasurer of Alpha Lambda Delta (ALD — a National Women's Sophomore Honor Society) told the Collegian that ALD is seeking, with the help of any interested undergraduates, to "encourage the establishment of a "quiet dorm" in the fall semester for those students who request such a living environment."

Ms. Plaziak said that a meeting will be held on Monday, March 18th at 7:30 p.m. in room 164 Campus Center for anyone wishing to help organize a "quiet dorm".

Unrelated to the work of ALD, on Friday, March 8th, the Faculty Senate passed a motion urging for the establishment of a "quiet dorm," Dr. Ellen Reed, Mathematics Professor and ALD Faculty Advisor told the Collegian.

The motion was introduced by Doris Abramson of the Theatre Department, on behalf of the UMass Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa (National Arts and Sciences Honor Society).

Ammended by the Senate, the motion now reads, "That the Faculty Senate of the University of Massachusetts at Amherst urges the administration of this campus to make a concerted effort to establish at least one "quiet dorm" at the earliest possible date."

It also asks, "That the Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs and President of the Student Government Association report to the Senate about the results of this effort no later than the last meeting of the Faculty Senate in the Spring of 1974."

Dr. Reed explained that the Faculty Senate ammended the motion because they thought it was not strong enough. The Senate added the words "at least one" instead of just calling for the establishment of "such a quiet dorm".

Dr. Robert Gage, Vice-Chancellor for Student Affairs explained the background of this push to establish a quiet dorm. He said that, "For a couple of years we have been receiving information about serious students leaving the University; they gave the reason that the dorms were noisy."

"We want to establish areas if not whole dorms where students can pursue academic interests," Dr. Gage said. He said that all sorts of living options should be available to students and cited that some students don't study well with stereos on.

Dr. Gage said that in a "Mini-Pulse Survey" conducted by the University Counselling Center last semester, 30 per cent of the students polled said they would prefer to live in a "quiet dorm."

He cited that a big problem with the idea will be in identifying a dorm that has a large turnover of students, in asking the remaining students if they would be willing to become a "quiet dorm", and getting those who don't wish this to leave.

Dr. Helen Hill, Director of the Non-Student Resident Resource Center and Advisor to ALD, told the Collegian that Dr. Gage spoke to her about "quiet dorms" and she suggested that ALD become involved in trying to establish this.

"If the students feel there is a need for this (a "quiet dorm"), this is our obligation to help fulfill their needs and wants," Dr. Hill said.

To determine just how many students are interested, Ms. Plaziak of ALD explained that they have put sign-up sheets in the CASIAC office from March 11th-15th. Ms. Plaziak explained that letters concerning this have also been sent to every dorm Head of Residence.

She said that the letter requests that they poll the students in their dorm (by ballot, sign-up sheets, mail-box notices, etc.) and send the results to Dr. Hill by March 15th. (Originally the date was March 20th but it's been changed.)

"It is evident by the "Mini-Pulse Survey" as well as by frequent student sentiment that an appreciable number of resident undergraduates want and need a specifically-designated residence hall(s) on campus that realizes the desire for comfortable surroundings that foster study conditions for the student who desires it," Ms. Plaziak said.

She said that, "Although ALD, in conjunction with Student Affairs, hopes to make such a living option available to the resident community, it is not the role of either group to dictate the structure nor the government of the "quiet dorm" environments."

Ms. Plaziak said that the student residents as potential residents of such a dorm should play an active role in the establishment of dorm administration and living arrangements.

She explained that the meeting on March 18th will set up a committee or student panel which will decide such things as the dorm's location, whether it will be co-ed or not, how the quiet hours will be set up, etc.

Dean George Sulzner, Assistant Dean for Social and Behavioral Sciences in the College of Arts and Sciences, offered the services of CASIAC in establishing a "quiet dorm" to both the Faculty Senate and ALD.

Sulzner told the Collegian that, "The idea of a "quiet dorm" is an idea we've been promoting or trying to promote for a long time." He said that CASIAC has been sort of "working behind the scenes" on this and is lending its support to Dr. Gage's idea.

Dean Jeremiah Allen, Dean of Humanities and Fine Arts in the College of Arts and Sciences and Secretary of the UMass Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, told the Collegian that "I encourage that the impetus for the "quiet dorm" come from the students, I think it has to be that way."

(Staff Photo-Steve Smith)

Although some would argue a "quiet dorm" is a contradiction of terms, those involved have high hopes for the project.

UMass allowed more city sewage tie-ups

UMass has been given a chance to tie six new buildings into the town of Amherst's sewage system by the state Division of Water Pollution Control (DWPC).

The buildings, including the brand new, concrete block fine arts center, were banned from connecting with the local sewage system by the DWPC in February, 1973, after local environmental groups claimed the system was overloaded at peak use times, resulting in the dumping of raw sewage into the Connecticut River.

The new DWPC ruling would allow UMass to seek tie-in permits for the new buildings, providing it can prove that the buildings will not add to the flow of sewage currently handled by local sewage treatment plants.

UMass claims that the use of the new buildings will only relocate existing personnel and their wastes and not increase the total amount of sewage pumped into the system by the university.

In addition to the UMass buildings a number of other new houses in the area have been forbidden from tying into the sewage system by the DWPC until a new "outfall line" to the Connecticut River is completed in November.

The "no new sewage" clause is the only loophole in the ban imposed on sewage tie-ins by the DWPC. The ruling forbidding new sewage tie-ins may result in at least one court fight. A local developer with seven new homes in North Amherst has taken the city to court once, unsuccessfully, and reportedly plans to try again.

Conservation Committee: keeping the people aware

By DONNA A. DIODATI
MDC Staff

"The energy problem is going to be with us for a long time," says Gordon Gillett, a member of the UMass Energy Conservation Committee.

Gillett, one of three students on the twelve-member committee, explained the group's origin: "Back in August, President Wood asked UMass Chancellors to look into energy conservation. (Then) Vice-Chancellor Campion was charged with organizing a committee of students, faculty, administration, and staff to set short-and long-range goals of energy conservation."

Two subcommittees, Technical and Public Relations, have evolved from the original group. Referring to the former, of which he is a member, Gillett said that it "has lately been concerned mostly with writing up policies on conservation to be sent to the Chancellor." As for public relations, he stated that "we've got to keep people aware, to change their habits." He added that more work in this area is needed.

Accomplishments of the Committee can be seen in several categories. According to Gillett, the University has saved almost 10 per cent in steam usage (primarily for heating) over last year. Consumption of electricity is averaging 6 per cent less than a year ago. (For some inexplicable reason, last month's electrical consumption was 15 per cent less than that of February 1973). The Committee also was involved in plans to close dormitories and other unused buildings during intersession. In addition, several thousand thermostats have been turned down to 68 degrees, but, Gillett, admits, "errors are unavoidable."

The "Kill-a-watt" stickers on light switches and "Walk-don't ride" elevator stencils are the work of the Committee. They also were instrumental in encouraging car pools and janitorial conservation practices.

Suggestions from the community resulted in energy conservation action at the Campus Center Garage. Previously, the large exhaust fans that remove automotive fumes from the building had been used 24 hours a day. Due to the Committee's recommendation (based on students' suggestions), the fans are now not used between midnight and 7:00 a.m.

Plans for the future include decreasing excessive ventilation in order to conserve heat. Too much ventilation, according to Gillett, pushed hot air out and cold air in, thus wasting energy. At the request of the Chancellor's office, and in view of Amherst's sewage treatment problems, the Committee is investigatin water conservation steps to be implemented at UMass.

Attributing the Committee's pre-energy crisis formation to "President Wood's foresight," Gillett went on to say, "We're going to submit to the administration an annual report indicating how UMass has conserved energy." He added that community suggestions have proved helpful in the past, and asked that those with conservation ideas submit them to the Energy Conservation Committee, 341 Whitmore.

Gordon Gillet, a member of the Umass Energy Conservation Committee, stresses the fact that people have to change their habits.

Rt. 47 crash: one killed, one injured

One youth died, and one was seriously injured, in a single car accident on Rt. 47 in Amherst at 11:30 last night. Amherst police and Northampton-based State Police would not release the names of the victims pending notification of next of kin.

The accident apparently occurred when their car went out of control and struck a tree. The car was torn in half. Although it could not be offically confirmed, the victims were believed to be students, as among accident records were found several textbooks and academic paraphernalia.

Details will be forthcoming upon police investigation.

California drops Ehrlichman charges

WASHINGTON (AP) - California authorities surrendered priority to federal indictments in the Ellsberg break-in case yesterday and agreed to ask that state conspiracy-burglary charges against John D. Ehrlichman and two others be dismissed.

Superior Court Judge Gordon Ringer in Los Angeles, who has summoned President Nixon as a material witness in the case, must make the final decision.

The agreement to seek dismissal of state charges against Ehrlichman, G. Gordon Liddy and David R. Young-all former White House aides-was announced after Dist. Atty. Joseph Busch of Los Angeles and Special Watergate Prosecutor Leon Jaworski met for an hour.

Ehrlichman would remain under a perjury charge in Los Angeles, the agreement said because "it involves protection solely of a state interest." There was no further explanation.

The California case had been scheduled for trial on April 15.

The state perjury charges stemmed from Ehrlichman's denial to the rand jury that he knew about or authorized the 1971 break-in at the office of Dr. Lewis Fielding by White House "plumbers" seeking files of Daniel Ellsberg. Ellsberg at the time had been indicted on charges of stealing and leaking the Pentagon Papers.

Ehrlichman's testimony to back their contention that Ehrlichman acted in his official capacity to prevent breaches of national security. It was expected that dismissal of the main charges would make the issue of presidential testimony moot.

Young, who was named as a co-conspirator in the federal case but was not indicted, would be free of any charges should Ringer go along with the agreement.

Liddy, already convicted and sentenced as a Watergate burglar and conspirator, is charged in the federal indicted returned last Thursday-alongside Ehrlichman and four others-with conspiracy to voilate Fielding's civil rights. Ehrlichman, additionally, is charged with four counts of lying to the FBI and grand jury.

"Among the reasons given for seeking to dismiss the state charges are that many of these issues involve matters of national interest and therefore would best be decided in the federal court system," said the joint Busch-Jaworski announcement.

"The two indictments would be exposing defendants to trial in two different jurisdictions and, in fairness to those defendants charged in both jurisdictions and in the interests of justice," they should be ried in one jurisdiction."

Bush was joined in the talks with Jaworski by Stephen Trott, an assistant district attorney.

Ehrlichman, formerly President Nixon's chief domestic adviser, and former special counsel Charles W. Colson, pleaded innocent to the charges in the Ellsberg case last Saturday as they were arrainged in the Watergate coverup indictments.

The other four indicted on the conspiracy charges were Liddy, Bernard L. Barker, Eugenio Martinez and Felipe DeDiego. Their arraignment is set efore U.S. District Judge Gerhard A. Gesell on Thursday.

In other Watergate-related matters:

-In Key Biscayne, Fla., White House Press Secretary Ronald L. Ziegler said "we will address...at some time in the future" a difference in statements made by President Nixon in August and at a news conference last Wednesday.

Ziegler would say only that there were "semantic differences" in the two statements concerning what the President learned of payments to the original Watergate defendants last March 21.

In a statement Aug. 15, 1973, the President said:

"I was told then that funds had been raised for payments to the defendants...but I was only told that the money had been used for attorneys' fees and family support, not that it had been paid to procure silence from the recipients."

"...And for the first time on March 21 he John W. Dean III told me that payments had been made to the defendants for the purpose of keeping them quiet, not simply for their defense."

Dist. Atty. supports SLA in call for TV air time

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) — The FBI said yesterday kidnaped Patricia Hearst's accusations of political intrigue against the agency and a letdown by her family were put into the victim's mouth by her terrorist captors.

Meantime, Alameda County Dist. Atty. Lowell Jensen indicated that two men accused of the terrorist-claimed assassination of Oakland School Supt. Dr. Marcus Foster could get the televised news conference they have demanded if some conditions are met.

In a 30-minute tape, the kidnapers demanded that nationwide television broadcast facilities be made available to purported SLA "soldiers" Joseph Remiro and Russell Little, as the pair have demanded. They are charged with killing Foster last Nov. 6.

On Sunday, Jensen said their lawyers would have to "make the first move toward such a broadcast."

On Monday, defense lawyer William Gagen said he would have a statement Tuesday or Wednesday, adding, "We must protect the interests of our clients in a fair trial and to comply in some way with demands of the SLA." He said last week such a conference might not be in the best interests of his clients.

Miss Hearst, in three tape-recorded Symbionese Liberation Army communiques clandestinely received over the weekend, accused the FBI of wanting her killed to promote President Nixon's policies, and scolded her parents for not "doing everything you can" to have her freed.

The food giveaway demanded by the SLA was to resume Tuesday.

Charles Bates, FBI agent in charge of the kidnaping investigation, asked if the 20-year-old coed, abducted Feb. 4, was being forced to make those statements, said, "I don't know, but I think it's a logical assumption."

Bates said that since the SLA was holding Miss Hearst, "she's saying what they tell her to say."

In response to a question, Bates said he had no evidence Miss Hearst was in on a plot to have herself kidnaped.

Charged

NORTHAMPTON, Mass (AP) — Three persons pleaded innocent Monday to charges of indecent exposure after they were arrested in separate weekend streaking incidents.

Ronald Altimari, 24, of Northampton, was arrested Saturday night as he allegedly dashed nude in the downtown area in a group of eight. Police said the other streakers escaped. Altimari's case was continued to March 26.

Penny Manson, 20, of Amherst and Sally Rhymes, 22, of Northampton will be back in court March 19 on charges in a separate Saturday incident.

Amnesty for evaders

WASHINGTON (AP) — Splitting with President Nixon, former Army Secretary Robert F. Froehlke urged Congress yesterday to legislate blanket conditional amnesty for Vietnam war draft evaders and case-by-case consideration of amnesty for deserters.

"We should forgive and forget if amnesty will help heal the hurt this nation has suffered," Froehlke told a House judiciary subcommittee considering amnesty legislation.

He said "this country will some day again be facing a draft," and any amnesty should not make a future draft unworkable.

But he told the congressmen he believed blanket amnesty for draft evaders who are now willing to serve their country in some form of public service would not have that effect.

Amnesty for deserters is more complicated, Froehlke said, and proposed that a special board be created to "look at the deserter's total record in a non-vindictive, generous manner" and decide whether he deserves amnesty.

Froehlke said amnesty should not be granted in the spirit that men who refused to serve in Vietnam were morally right but also should not be given on demand of public service that is treated as punishment or vindication.

During the afternoon session, the committee, chaired by Rep. Robert W. Kastenmeer (D-Wisconsin), heard testimony from a University of Wisconsin graduate representing a statewide amnesty project.

"To suggest conditional amnesty only perpetuates descrimination against those persons who chose to act out their oppositions to the war openly," said James Struve, a spokesman for the Wisconsin Amnesty Project.

"An argument for conditional amnesty overlooks the fact that many young Americans faced no alternatives but illegal resistance to the war," he said.

WASHINGTON (AP) - Public controversy over President Nixon's income taxes has set alarm bells ringing in the Internal Revenue Service, but officials of the tax agency are not sure yet whether they have a fire.

The question is whether Nixon's minimal tax payments, about $6,000 on total income of nearly $800,000 over the three years ending with 1972, may tempt other Americans to look for loopholes or try to avoid taxes.

It will be several months before the IRS can analyze enough 1973 returns to determine whether there is such a taxpayer reaction. For the present, tax officials publicly express confidence there will be none; privately, they are known to be concerned.

From around the country, in news reports, in declarations by politicians and in statements from outside tax experts, come warnings of taxpayer resistance, resulting in part from the Nixon affair, that could lead to a significant reduction in anticipated government revenues.

Rep. Charles Vanik, a Democrat on the tax-writing House Ways and Means committee, predicts "a massive movement by American taxpayers into the gray areas of tax avoidance" which he said could slash revenues by as much as 10 per cent, or nearly $25 billion.

AFL-CIO President George Meany said "the fact that the President combed the tax laws for loopholes sets an example to the American people to likewise avoid or evade taxes."

A New York-based tax advisory firm told its clients that "IRS officials are afraid that average taxpayers will follow the recent examples of corner cutting politicos and do some wholesale cheating of their own." The IRS, it added, would scrutinize all returns with large business expense writeoffs.

Senior IRS officials dispute such predictions. The worst that can happen, they contend, is that many taxpayers are likely to press harder than in the past for legal but perhaps questionable deductions.

Even that, some of them concede, could result in a cutback in anticipated federal tax receipts for 1974.

"Certainly we don't expect the taxpayers to be any less honest with themselves this year," says John J. Olszewski, chief of the IRS Intelligence Division which pursues tax fraud cases.

"They are going to be either honest or dishonest, depending on their own moral standards, but not because somebody else supposedly set an example for them."

He added, that on the basis of past experience some taxpayers caught chiseling can be expected to point to the questionable records of high-ranking or prominent people in defense of their own transgressions.

Despite its outwardly calm approach, there is no doubt that the Internal Revenue Service is concerned-if not about 1974 tax collections, then about what one official calls false impressions generated by tte publicity given Nixon's tax troubles and resulting speculation about how other taxpayers might react.

These days are not gone forever.

Viet hospital bombed 32 children killed;

MY THO, South Vietnam (AP) - The children in My Tho hospital shared no laughter yesterday. Only pain.

Saturday afternoon a single 82mm mortar round landed in their midst seconds before they were to have left the playground.

Officials said 32 children were killed and scores wounded.

The seriously wounded were taken to the My Tho city hospital, about five miles from the Cai Lay schoolyard where the Viet Cong shell exploded.

The hospital is an average one for Vietnam. Water in an old whisky bottle, one pink plastic cup for 55 sick bodies, and 11 double beds for them. On one of those beds were eight little boys.

"I didn't know what had happened," said Dang Van Ngot, 13. "My leg felt itchy and I looked down. I saw blood coming out from both my feet. I tried to crawl to the classroom wall to hide. I didn't hurt, but I was very afraid. Then a teacher came and picked me up and took me to the firstaid place. Then I hurt. But I didn't cry."

As he spoke softly Ngot held the hand of his best friend, who was lying next to him, and tried to keep the buzzing flies away from his bandaged legs. Like the rest of the children, his small body was encrusted with grime and dried blood was still caked between his toes and fingers.

His plastic sleeping mat and mosquito net, too, were stained from the drippings of his wounds. He still wore the once-white shirt and black short pants he'd put on to walk to school three days earlier.

"We were once more than 70. But now how many are left I don't know. Blood just kept coming out everywhere..everyone wanted their mother and father...I was so afraid I almost fainted," said Vo Van Dan, 7.

Hour after hour, Dan writhed back and forth on his small hospital bed moaning from the pain of his shrapnel-riddled left leg and shattered hip.

Wounded Knee S.D.

Civilians do hospital run during past AIM attack

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) - An elderly man testified that he and a companion were ordered to drive an injured man to a hospital from Wounded Knee, S.D., the night the village was invaded by the American Indian Movement AIM.

"He, the injured man, said Mr. Banks hired him to come down there," said John E. Provost of Martin, S.D., at the St. Paul trial of two AIM leaders. "He said he was from St. Paul."

The court strained to hear the sometimes inaudible testimony of tte 71-year-old Provost, who said he was hard of hearing. Provost testified at the federal trial of Dennis Banks, 41, of St. Paul, and Russell Means, 34, of Porcupine, S.D.

The two American Indian Movement leaders are charged with burglary, theft, assault, firearms violations and conspiracy.

Provost said that he visited a sister in Pine Ridge the night the village was occupied last Feb. 27. Provost said that he and a friend, Robert Carlow, drove the 17 miles to Wounded Knee in Carlow's car, arriving there between 7 and 8 p.m.

As they drew near the trading post, a pickup truck blocked the road, so they made a short detour and approached from the other side.

While they sat in the car, "six or seven guys came out of the building with guns - looked like guns to me," the witness said.

One came to the passenger's side where Provost was sitting, hit on the door with his gun and said, "Open the door, we want this car."

Provost said he and Carlow were ordered by one of the men to leave.

British miners back to work

LONDON (AP) — Britain's 280,000 miners began fulltime work today after a four-week strike and a three-month slowdown that crippled the country's economy.

The National Coal Board said it would take another four weeks to return to 100 full production. It predicted production would be 50 per cent of normal by the end of this week, 75 per cent by the end of next week and 90 per cent plus the weekend after that.

Normal weekly coal production is about 2.5 million tons. The miners' action to get a larger pay raise than the Conservative government was willing to give them started with a ban on overtime and weekend work that cut coal production up to 40 per cent. The government put much of industry on a three-day work week on Dec. 15 to conserve fuel supplies.

Sears cites Vesco tipoff

NEW YORK (AP) - Financier Robert Vesco was tipped in advance by an unidentified federal informant that a criminal conspiracy indictment was in the works involving himself, former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and ex-Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans, government witness Harry Sears testified today.

Sears said he was summoned by Vesco's home on Dec. 7, 1972, several days after the Securities and Exchange Commission had filed a massive fraud suit against the international financier. The witness said the only other person present was Donald Nixon Jr., a nephew of the President and a Vesco aide.

"Mr. Vesco told me he had information that led him to be certain the SEC staff had jumped Louisiana Gov. Edwin Edwards says he will announce a voluntary gasoline rationing plan for Louisiana motorists today, based on the so-called Oregon license plate system.

Edwards, contacted at the executive office in Baton Rouge Sunday night, said, "I want to emphasize that this is a voluntary plan."

He called it "an effort to cut down the size of long lines at service stations and to conserve available gasoline."

He added that he had no immediate hopes for increasing the amount of gasoline available for Louisiana motorists.

Nationwide, motorists generally found last weekend a bit easier in their search for gasoline. Fourteen weeks after the first "Gasless Sunday," service stations were open in increased numbers, an Associated Press survey revealed. The trend for business as usual on Sunday is a result of concern over declining tourist revenues and long lines during the week.

In many cases, the Sunday openings were urged by state officials. The New York State Thruway Authority announced an end to Sunday closings, claiming they caused too much "hardship and inconvenience."

In Allentown, Pa., the gasoline shortage has been blamed for the first cancellation in the history of the city's annual St. Patrick's Day parade.

R.I. considers refinery

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Representatives of Olympic Refineries were scheduled to meet with Gov. Philip Noel of Rhode Island today to discuss a refinery proposal for a portion of the Newport Naval Base.

Meanwhile, officials from Newmarket were to meet with Gov. Meldrim Thomson of New Hampshire to discuss shifting a proposed refinery site from Durham to Newmarket.

Last week the voters in Durham, the home of the University of New Hampshire, turned down a $600 million refinery proposal by Olympic.

The company said it would build the refinery in Newmarket if the town approves the project, but that it would also explore other sites in New England. Newmarket was the only seacoast-area town to approve the Durham plan in straw polls at town meetings.

Philip G. Hendrickx, a selectman in Newmarket, said that governor's office requested the meeting, presumably "it will be talk about the refinery."

The chairman of the Senate Committee on Resources and Finance announced that hearings on two bills that could affect a refinery proposal would be given public hearings in Portsmouth on Wednesday night.

The measures would establish a state agency to select refinery sites and would allow towns without zoning to reject refineries on a majority vote. Sen. Frederick A. Porter, R-Amherst, said the Portsmouth session would allow for more comment from the "area of the state most affected by the establishment of an oil refinery,"

The Rhode Island proposal involves the Melville Tank Farm, a portion of the Newport Base that is being phased out under an economic cutback by the Navy.

Arab split widening over oil embargo

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

In an apparent widening of the Arab split over lifting the oil embargo, Egyptian President Anwar Sadat initiated his own informal talks with Arab oil ministers Monday, and Tunisia made a bid for a wider role in solving Middle East problems.

After a top meeting of Arab oil ministers was postponed for the second time, Sadat called a smaller meeting of oil ministers for Monday night.

At about the same time, Tunisia called for a shift in the location of an upcoming Arab League meeting from the Egyptian capital to Tunis.

A reliable Arab League source said that President Habib Bourguiba of Tunisia "wants Tunis to have a greater voice in Arab decisions."

In Seattle, Wash., Egyptian Ambassador Ashraf Fhorbal said his country was looking ahead positively to the upcoming meeting of Arab foreign ministers in Tripoli. But he suggested that lifting of the Arab oil embargo might hinge on disengagement of Israeli troops on the Syrian front.

Sayed Nofal, the Arab League's assistant secretary-general, said Tunisia proposed that league ministers meet in Tunis on March 25 to discuss "very important" topics. He declined to elaborate, but one topic is expected to be the twice-postponed Arab summit conference on oil.

If Tunisia's request is approved Thursday when the league's council convenes in Cairo, it would be the first Arab League meeting scheduled outside the Egyptian capital in 12 years.

The Arab League, a grouping of 14 Arab states headquartered in Cairo, was formed in 1945 to promote Arab unity and work toward various Arab goals.

Oil ministers from the nine Arab nations that originally imposed the oil embargo scheduled their top-level gathering in Tripoli, Libya on Feb. 14. That meeting was reset for this past Sunday in Cairo, and then put off again until this Wednesday in Tripoli.

Sadat had tried to get all the Arab oil ministers to assemble in Cairo to consider his proposal that the oil embargo against the United States be lifted.

However three of the nine countries involved-Algeria, Libya and Syria-failed to send representatives. Those who were prepared for the Cairo negotiations were representatives from Saudi Arabis, Kuwait, Abu Dhabi, Bahrain, Qatar and Egypt.

Sadat has been pressing for an end to the Arab oil embargo against the United States because of Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger's help in getting Israeli troops to withdraw from the Suez Canal. Algeria, Libya and Syria are holding out for a similar pullback of Israeli troops facing Syrian forces in the Golan Heights.

A Collegian survey of 36 local area gas stations found motorists paying an average of 51.8 for Regular, 53.8 for mid grade, and 56. for Premium.

The survey covered all stations on Route 9 from 202 in Belchertown to Rt. 5 in Northampton, both stations in downtown Amherst on N. Pleasant St., N. Amherst, E. Pleasant St., Pelham Rd., and Rte. 5 North of Rt. 9 in Northampton to Damon Rd. It was taken Sat., March 9, in the afternoon. The same brands of gas will generally cost two or three cents more in Amherst and Hadley than in Northampton.

We found the majority of stations were closed at this time although gasoline was easily attained in the middle afternoon. With few exceptions, the lines were approx. five cars in length.

Summer allocations:

Tourism won't be considered

By DAVID C. MARTIN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) — Deputy energy chief John C. Sawhill acknowledged yesterday that state by state allocations of gasoline this summer will not reflect recent increases in tourism.

Allocations are based on a percentage of gasoline sales in 1972 plus growth in vehicle registration since then, said Sawhill.

He told a group of New England senators that the formula would not take into account any increases in the number of out-of-state motorists visiting a tourist area during the summer months.

"Northern New England is going to be hit in the head," by the formula, predicted Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre, D-N.H.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, D-Me., asked Sawhill to set up a study group at the Federal Energy Office to evaluate the impact of the current formula on the summer touring season.

Sawhill also came under sharp questioning by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., over the allocation of gasoline for the month of March to Massachusetts. Although emergency allocations have temporarily reduced the size of gasoline lines, Kennedy said, Massachusetts "will have less gasoline per day in March than in February."

Kennedy explained that the FEO had not taken into account the emergency allocations ordered at the end of February when figuring the March level of supplies.

Congressmen ask broadcasters to promote oil company reform

By JAMES GERSTENZANG

WASHINGTON (AP) — In an effort to counter oil company advertising, 16 members of Congress asked the nation's 7,000 broadcasters yesterday to carry commercials suggesting the oil companies, not the consumers will have to change their habits.

Announcing the media campaign at a news conference, Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal, D-N.Y., cited the "Fairness Doctrine" in his effort to convince the radio and television stations to carry the announcements to balance what he calls a multi-million dollar advertising campaign waged by the energy industry.

He said that if his efforts are not successful within 30 to 60 days, legislative action to remove certain tax exemptions granted to companies for advertising expenses may be necessary.

"The average consumer - the average American - simply has not been afforded an equal opportunity to hear the other side," Rosenthal said.

"We must combat the gross imbalance created by the industry's advertising blitz if the public is to make intelligent and well-informed decisions about the current situation and future national energy policy."

The group of representatives, joined by five consumer and environmental groups, is offering several commercials. One, showing a well lit office building at night, features an announcer saying:

"The power companies tell the small users to conserve, but rate studies tell the big users to use more. It seems like a strange way to save energy."

To streak is not for the meek

By DARIO POLITELLA

To steak is not for the meek.

That's the very first conclusion to be drawn from raw data available from the studies, both textual and photographic, that have been appearing in the nation's press.

It takes guts to practice what students have been preaching, since their coming out of the campus doldrums that followed those halcyon days when they drove goldfish down their alimentary canals.

Nowadays, they're literally letting it all hang out.

And from the other side of the lectern, the professors see that this is good.

As student-watchers of experience and devotion, some professors are predicting that a result of streaking is that campus lifestyles will be better. And streaking is only the first manifestation. For as soon as students succeed in exercising this devil within, they'll find others.

Like inhibitions about dress, contempt for aged profs, distaste for the Establishment they will inevitably join, marriage and motherhood.

Streakers are obviously the leaders of the New Generation. For they are already putting into practice what the White House has been preaching since Watergate 1972: hide nothing and keep America moving.

An editorial in the University of Maine student newspaper recently suggested that even President Nixon might be able to regain some of his credibility if he streaked from the White House to the Justice Department, in front of television cameras.

"The American public would cheer the President for finally exposing himself."

Further proof, if needed, that the streakers are heading for fame and fortune in politics is indicated by the heady slogans they have conjured.

"Have you got the cheek to streak?" is the challenge at the University of Louisville. "Stop your grinnin', drop your linen."

The echo comes from Berkeley, where University of California students have been smarting at their apathy, since Mario Savio lead the Free Speech Movement in 1964 that began the student revolts that spread across the country. In 1974, their cry became "Hell yes, we'll undress."

Mad Ave couldn't have done better. But then, in the eyes of the New Generation, they're too meek to streak.'

The new Spring rite of barreling in the buff has come as no surprise to academics, both teaching and administrative, who know that the fullness of the moon and the approaching vernal equinox portend that the saps would soon be running. It's happened every year since the Greeks began their Olympiad with a run in the raw.

Three Yalies remembered. And they streaked the streets of New Haven, accompanied by a fully clothed guide carrying a torch.

And as if to emphasize the educational aspects of the new campus caper, The New York Times has reported that when a trio of streakers appeared at a lecture on Roman history at Princeton University, "It could not be immediately ascertained whether they were attempting to illustrate the discussion or to comment on civilization's decline and fall."

Another aspect of the streaking movement which has aroused admiration among professors is the talent for organizing which has surfaced on the campuses.

Directing the dashes at St. Louis University is the National Collegiate Streaking Association. At the State University Center at New Paltz, N.Y., it's the New Paltz Intramural Streaking Club.

Under the banner, "We have nothing to hide," some Harvard students run the gauntlet organized as FUDA- Fully Unclothed Dashing Activists.

And while "Streak Control" is into things at Texas Technological University, activities at Indiana University are decentralized into outfits like the Colonial Crest Apartments Streaker Club and the Dunn Hill Apartments Streakers.

But the group that has shown the most imagination, at least as far as English professors are concerned, is at Penn State. Someone there with an appreciation for acronyms has conjured the Association of Student Streakers (A.S.S.).

To streak undoubtedly is not for the meek.

Where did it all start?

Professors with a penchant for history have looked to the popular press for the answer.

An editor at the University of Bridgeport's student newspaper says it all began at the University of Maryland in November 1973. One press service credits the University of Florida. And at the same time, it discovered one Fred R. Pierce, who was expelled frrm Stanford University in 1918 for sprinting his bare bottom past sorority row. Now 74, Mr. Justice Pierce is retired from the California Appeals Court.

There are other conclusions a professor may draw from the serious side of the podium. Former University of Massachusetts president John Lederle, who now teaches political science at the Amherst campus, has told his students that "It's better than painting clenched fists on the buildings."

At the University of Maine at Crone, there was a suggestion that streaking be adopted as a varsity sport, with annual Big Ten playoffs in a "Lady Godiva Bowl."

And under a photo showing nude couples at the end of the sprint, a University of Massachusetts Daily Collegian writer asks, "What is the student body coming to?"

At Indiana Unviersity, a psychology major told an inquiring newsman that "The whole practice is insane and shouldn't be analyzed."

But from a professor's eye view, streaking can be scholarly.

Soc et tuum.

Letters To The Editor

Quinn: incorrect, discredited

To The Editor:

*Mr. Mark Vogler's questioning, of unannounced gubernatorial candidate Attorney General Robert Quinn, resulted in some interesting answers (Quinn sees energy problems MDC Feb. 27, 1974) relative to Belchertown State School.

Mr. Quinn is correct in noting that the Sargent administration is being forced, by U.S. District Court Judge Joseph Tauro, "to take action". Attorney General Quinn is also correct in observing that "certain citizens in this case challenged the behavior of the administration." We have indeed and we shall continue to do so.

Mr. Quinn credited his office with having achieved a consent decree in the suit in question (Ricci et al. v. Greenblatt et al. 72-469T). To whom, then, does the discredit go? Did Mr. Quinn advise his Assistant Attorneys General O'Malley and Mayo to file their contemptuous motion, on March 1, 1972, "A Constitutional Right to Treatment Cannot Be Predicated Upon A System of Voluntary Admissions"? That motion was denied. Did he also advise his "lieutenants" to file the April 20, 1972 document which was replete with the phrase "Defendants deny each and every allegation"? Did he permit the stalling — through legal maneuvering — which extended for 21 months and 28 days from the filing of the suit? Perhaps Attorney General Quinn, the "Peoples Attorney", might wish to replay?

The Attorney General is also incorrect. In expressing the view that "we might be robbing Peter to pay Paul by taking out of the budget of other state schools to provide the necessary funds for Belchertown", Mr. Quinn exposes his ignorance of the process. The $2.6 million gained through our consent decree represents money which had already been budgeted for Belchertown State School. Through judicial pressure, we merely assured its release. An example of what might have happened took place last Thursday, February 28th. Governor Sargent permitted $1.1 million, which had already been allocated by the legislature for direct care positions at Monson, Dever, and Fernald State Schools, to be transferred to the welfare budget. Who's robbing whom?

The gubernatorial campaign is on. The rhetoric will flow — there is no metabolic energy crisis — and it may even sound convincing, but we will cut through the verbiage. Instead, we will look at the record. We ask each student-voter, in fact each Massachusetts voter, to vote with the retarded citizens in mind. We are their voice — and their vote.

Bussing suggestions

To The Editor:

I am a bus rider. As many of you with similar persuasions may have noticed this semester, the buses are quite crowded much of the time, what with the gas shortage and all. The crowding is a problem since sometimes people can't be let aboard, and I would like to offer a few suggestions which might help to alleviate the space problems we now face.

1. Install roof racks. Students could ride on the presently unused roofs by climbing up (ropes would be provided) and strapping in.

2. Put a small hydraulic ram in the front of the bus next to the driver. This would be used to compress bodies and make more room. Most UMIES would never notice and many more people could be fit into a limited space. The driver would also benefit from increased visibility.

3. Install body racks which would hang from the hand hold bars inside the bus. The roof racks can't be used in inclement weather.

4. Replace the engines with sets of pedals to be manned by volunteers at each stop. This would save energy, reduce the UMASS waistline, cut bus maintenance, and not adversely affect general bus performance.

5. Charge fares. This would...wait a minute. I ride too.

Racism real, but...

To The Editor:

re: Prof. Walter Stewart's letter to your paper. Damn straight the blacks in this area can be generally characterized as being somewhat paranoid. Who wouldn't be, taking the crap they get in this country? As a white who has spent time in predominantly black countries, I too, have felt the pressures of being a member of a despised minority. However, I also know how often I "detected" insults where none were intended. I think the people who object to McGilvray's cartoons miss the point that he is deliberately caricaturing the stereotypes in our society, in order to mock and enervate them. Lenny Brucc used the words, "nigger, sheeny, shit, cunt" countless times in his performances in the hope that by pounding these obscene words into our heads we would become bored, yet impatient with their obscene connotations. Would anyone accuse Bruce of being, for instance, anti-semitic?

UMass dating dull

To The Editor:

In my several years at UMass I have noticed that dating has become almost a lost art on campus. The growth of co-ed dorms has destroyed the mystique of the opposite sex and limited the amount of campus dating. At UMass it has gotten to a point where either you live with a member of the opposite sex, or you sit in on a co-ed card game, with very little in between.

There doesn't seem to be any place in the UMass vicinity where members of the opposite sex can meet. Bars such as the Blue Wall and the Pub have too phony an atmosphere for meeting people. You rarely develop a relationship out of a bar room meeting, anyways.

It has gotten to a point where the stereotyped UMass girl is one with horn-rimmed glasses, hair that she ran an electric current through, and patched jeans. The average girl would rather groove on Robin Morgan's latest book than be exploited by going to a movie.

UMass has a very large population of girls with boy friends at home. They come to UMass because it is a cheap place to go to school while they wait for their boy friends to graduate or make a start in life. It all boils down to the fact that UMass has perpetuated a system that fosters unreal relations with the opposite sex.

The money movement

Where have all the hippies gone? Whatever happened to the revolution? How come you never see anyone flash the peace sign as a greeting any longer?

I guess it's not hip to be a hippie. I guess it's not in vogue to denounce middle class values and really stick by those philosophies. I guess that it's gauche to become involved.

If the eighteen year old voting age had as much support and enthusiasm as the eighteen year old drinking age, we'd all be in a lot better position. If the primaries had the same turnout as a Saturday night in the Bluewall, maybe we'd have a political system that didn't make everyone so wary of politicians. Maybe we should streak to the polls.

When Timothy Leary asked people to tune in, turn on, and drop out, I guess everyone thought that he meant to ignore the world around us. Maybe we took his advice too seriously. I never thought that we'd drop out of life.

If more men got involved in the woman's movement, and more WASPS got involved in the minority movement, and more people got into the people movement, there would be no need of these movements. We'd already be there. I mean, that was the whole purpose of the hippie movement.

So what happened? Where did it all fall apart? Whatever happened to $15 lids and $2 Salvation Army overcoats? Well, your friend who sells you dope now tells you that the quantity price is higher, so you have to pay the price for getting higher. And another friend has bought out the Salvation Army so that he can sell the clothes in the Campus Center or in the back of a "hip" store as antique clothing. I guess as long as everyone has their pockets filled everyone is happy, which is cool, in a way. But when everyone starts getting greedy and selfish, then that philosophy goes against the flower-power, love children theme.

Is everyone so qualuded out that all they can think of is getting the bucks from their friends? The idea used to be that you bought a quantity of downs so that you could sell most of them, and have a few left over for yourself. Now it seems that the idea is to buy quantities so that you can sell a few, have a lot for yourself and have some money left over. The big profit idea used to be "the enemy, the establishment,the capitalist pigs." I guess big profits are the new prophets of life. Money is powerful and why give spare change to charity when you can buy yourself a beer? Besides, a revolution means that you have to work for it. And who the hell wants to work when you don't get paid?

So what's happening to the counter-culture? Are we going to become what we originally turned away from? I think so, because the only counter-culture that I see is what you can sell over it.

UMass needs cultural day

By LUIS MANUEL MEDINA

We live in a society in which old and new values are combined in order to maintain a constant movement toward peace, progress and cooperation among the different people living in the world.

Universities play an important role, because it is in those liberal places that people have more freedom to try new ways of getting ahead of problems. The integration of old and new ideas, values, concepts and methods are the basis for innovations that everybody expects to work.

The University of Massachusetts is one of those innovative places. It combines methods of education, ideas and concepts from different races, cultures and sub-cultures. Here, we try to improve the best approaches to find solutions to problems. We are part of an innovative institution, that is dealing with one of the most important aspects of the success of any action, that is people.

Considering the differences of each individual personality, together with the complexities of the differences in culture and sub-culture, religion and race, this is not an easy task. It is not an impossible one, either.

We usually talk about how well prepared a student should be when leaving the university to enter a profession. Another important factor of education is how much we learn in dealing with people whose culture is different from ours.

People coming to this university, students or not, we must learn how to deal with people. University President Robert Wood once said that modern universities must have students from all over the world. Many UMass students are from foriegn countries. Everybody in the university must make an effort, so that even with those cultural differences, an individual understanding can be achieved.

Things are not perfect, but progress has been made. Students, faculty , professor s and staff need to make an effort to try to understand minority groups. Minority groups must make a great effort, too, to understand the majority.

One of our biggest responsibilities is to strive for goals that satisfy the majority and minority groups. Minorities ask respect for their values and culture. The same holds for the majority?

Minorities can do it. Dr. Silvia Viera said "Majorities and minorities must be educated in respect to the culture and the history of the other group. And Dr. Johanetta Cole has said "Sharing and reciprocity are very essential in dealing with people".

If we think that education in other histories and cultures is a good approach to improve racial or cultural relations, why not establish a day the university community can set up goals in order to develop these relations as the Pilgrims instituted a day for thanks. (Accion d Gracias in Puerto Rico). Things were certainly not perfect then, they had confidence that they could improve the situation.

We cannot say that UMass has achieved complete racial or cultural equality, though it has made progrrss in human relations that give more opportunity to the minorities.

Minority groups now we are getting more rights and equality, and many of them have been achieved with the help of members of the majority group. Let's establish a Thanks Day, in respect to the majority.

As Winston Churchill said "Responsibility is the price of"...equality.

Last round KO for Nixon?

The White House Seven are under indictment. Richard Nixon is coming out for the last round. Spiro Agnew is sipping champagne and playing golf with Frank Sinatra. The campuses have turned to a new kind of activism. To a large extent, the majority of citizens in the United States seem confused; they want to revise the past without bringing on a new adventure for the future.

Students are tired of protesting. The silent majority seems tired of not protesting. Gerals Ford seems to be slipping into the role as the dignified-if not too bright hero of Republican inertia. Fritz Mondale is running; Scoop Jackson is plotting; and Teddy Kennedy is trying to come to grips with both his ambitions and desire to stay alive.

While this is only the second year of Nixon's second term, it seems to be the final act of the Nixon drama. Trapped from various sides by elements he once depended on as well as those he always despised; he is now more than ever proving that just ecause you are paranoid, it doesn't mean that you don't have enemies.

Nixon's enemies list now stands close to 142 million people...the people who have lost trust in him; who feel he is a crook; and-or an incompetent. The people on the list belong to no one pressure group, religion, or political party. The movement to remove the President is becoming more and more a non-partisan effort. If anything, it is the Republicans who are beginning to panic and now starting to hint openly and more often, that they wouldn't mind one bit if Gerald Ford was the next President of the United States...by next month.

So it seems safe to conclude that the days of Richard Nixon's Presidency are numbered. The death blow might be Watergate; or his income tax problems; or the shady dealings concerning the purchase and government improvements of his homes in San Clemente and Key Biscayne. The final pressure might come from Eastern bankers; Conservative Senators; or pompous oilmen. One thing seems certain-Richard Nixon will go. One thing is definite-Nixon should go!

Nixon should go because he is a crook. Forget about his attempts to answer questions concerning his involvement in the Watergate cover-up with the slick smurky reply, "I've also quit beating my wife."

The statement is sinister; the mind seems weary, and the man seems weak. His knees are beginning to buckle from escalating verbal "punches" from the right as well as the left. His eyes dark from sleepless nights, resemble those of a boxer whose face has been smashed. This is Nixon's last round, and some of the people at ringside have given up hope for a victory; they are now praying that he can walk out of the ring... and not be carried off on a stretcher.

Cuba, si!

For 13 years the U.S. has been observing an economic embargo against Cuba. And like Secretary of State Kissinger's evaluation of the Arab oil embargo, "it is growing more inappropriate each day."

Representative Michael J. Harrington (D-Mass.) recently introduced legislation to repeal the Cuban Resolution of 1962 which established the embargo. In a press release, Harrington said in the "context of this changing state of international affairs, U.S. policies toward Cuba are simply out of date."

The Collegian agrees with the Congressman. The highpoint of the Nixon administration has been the opening of diplomatic channels with Communist China. The President says he also has a good dialogue with Soviet leaders.

The purpose of this detente, the public is told, is to improve the world's diplomatic climate, to hopefully prevent a world war which has resulted from a misunderstanding or lack of communication between countries.

If this is so, then Mr. Nixon seems to have forgotten about the Cuban Missile Crisis, seems to have forgotten that U.S. and Cuban soldiers face each other 24 hours a day with loaded machine guns at Guantanamo Naval Station, and seems to have forgotten that Mr. Castro wants the American military out of the Naval base.

To further tensions, Mr. Nixon also seems to have forgotten that the U.S. Navy uses Guantanamo Bay as a home port for ships practicing war maneuvers.

Cuba remains a potential "hot-spot." As our cold war and hard-line attitudes toward Cuba continue, the spark which could set off a nuclear confrontation is being kept alive.

The time has come to normalize relations with Cuba, beginning with an end to the economic embargo. We urge the President to reconsider his present policies toward the island and we urge our readers to support the Harrington resolution.

Harvard director

CAMBRIDGE (AP) - Jonathan Moore has been appointed director of the Institute of Politics at Harvard University, the school announced yesterday.

Moore, a close associate of former U.S. Attorney General Elliot Richardson, formerly was Assistant Secretary of Defense for International Security Affairs. Deputy Assistant Secretary of State and a counselor to the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

A graduate of Dartmouth College and Harvard, Moore, 41, followed Richardson in 1973 to the Defense Department as special assistant to the secretary and subsequently to the Justice Department. Moore resigned in October when Richardson resigned as Attorney General.

As director of the Institute of Politics, Moore will become an ex officio member of the public administration faculty in the John F. Kennedy School of Government, of which the institute is a branch.

The institute, established in 1966, sponsors student, faculty and fellows programs in political study.

Moore and his family live in Alexandria, Va.

Construction strike

BOSTON (AP) - Hundreds of heavy-equipment operators stayed off the job at construction sites throughout eastern Massachusetts yesterday as union members went on strike because of wages and working conditions.

Members of Local 4 of the Operating Engineers Union, AFL-CIO, struck four major contractors" associations at midnight because the union says no new wage increases have been offered since the old contract expired Feb. 28.

"Construction projects in excess of a half-billion dollars will be affected," said Thomas Gunning, executive director of the Building Trades Employers Association, one of the contractor groups affected.

Meskill not to run

HARTFORD (AP) - Gov. Thomas J. Meskill announced Monday that he will not be a candidate for re-election this year.

"After much thought I have decided to seek a new and different challenge," Meskill said without elaborating.

Meskill, elected in 1970, read a one-page statement to a news conference but refused to answer any questions.

Right to die

BOSTON (AP) - The Massachusetts legislature begins discussion today of an emotional issue that may haunt it for the next few years: the right of a terminaaly ill patient to die if he chooses.

The bill, sponsored by Rep. John S. Ames, R-Easton, woud give legal force to a "living will" in which a person requests that "if there is no reasonable expectation of my recovery from physical or mental disability...I be allowed to die and not be kept alive by artificial means or heroic measures."

Ames does not expect the bill - which comes before the Judiciary Committee Tuesday - to pass this year or even next year.

But he says he would like to open a dialogue on the subject, which he says most people shy away from.

"The major difficulty with coming to grips with such an issue is the fact that our society now for three or four generations has had no intimate experience with death," he says. "Death is as much a part of life as birth is, yet it's the unknown, untalked about part of life."

Even doctors and nurses, he says, admit that it is easier to work at prolonging life than to come to grips with the fact of death.

In a letter to Ames, Cardinal Humberto Medeiros said the subject should not even be discussed.

"I am personally convinced that the very presentation of such a propo al is further evidence of continuing attempts to erode the moral fibre of society in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts," Medeiros said.

Candidate Iannella

BOSTON (AP) - Boston City Councillor Christopher A. Iannella today announced his candidacy for the Democratic nomination for lieutenant governor.

Iannella joins a growing field of candidates which includes state Rep. Michael McLaughlin, D-Billerica, and Eva Hester, an aide to the House Ways and Means Committee.

The councillor rapped the Uargent administration for failing to address such major problems as unemployment, crime, taxes and inflation.

"Time and time again the state has imposed obligations on our minicipalities, then refused to fund them," Iannella said. These practices must stop. It's time Massachusetts called a halt. Those who spend the money must be forced to raise it."

Wrong color plates

BOSTON (AP) - A small number of Massachusetts motorists are beginning to see red about their blue license plates.

The latest plates issued to Bay State motorists have red lettering on a white background. The previous issue had blue letters on white.

However, 1,400 of the two million plates on state roads are still blue because the state Registry of Motor Vehicles says either the plate makers made mistakes or bureaucratic red tape has held up issuing new ones.

Most of the blue plates are special vanity or ham radio tags and drivers have been reporting being pulled over repeatedly by police who think they are driving illegally.

The Registry has issued green decals for the blue plate specials showing that they are legal and motorists has paid all his fees.

But because of complaints about hassles with the law, Registrar David J. Lucey issued letters of proof to each driver to flash in front of a policeman with a ticket book.

However, the problems continue and motorists still are being pulled to the side of the road.

One reason for this, a Registry spokesman said, is that the department has yet to notify police departments in writing about the blue plates and many policemen just don't know about the problem.

10 years too late

CRANSTON, R.I. (AP) - A man assigned to the criminally insane ward at the Rhode Island Medical Center in 1948 has been released - nearly 10 years after he regained mental health and should have been allowed to go home, according to the doctor who pressed legal officials to consider the case.

Albert Campanini, 58, was described as docile and mile-mannered when he was officially discharged from the Medical Center after a Superior Court hearing last week. He was ruled incompetent to stand trial 26 years ago on three robbery charges and was sent to the Medical Center for treatment of schizophrenia.

The charges were dismissed at the hearing, in accordance with a new law. It provides that criminal charges be automatically dropped if a man is sent to the Medical Center for incompetency to stand trial and remains there for two-thirds of the maximum term of imprisonment for the most serious offense he is charged with.

Companini served six years more than the new law requires.

The patient's release was triggered by the persistent efforts of Dr. Hugo Halo, a Medical Center physician who was assigned to the case in January, 1973.

"He should have been released many years ago," the doctor contended.

Ford in Boston: "Participate in the system"

By STEVEN A. COHEN
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — Vice President Gerald Ford was honored by a group of young people at the Harvard Club here yesterday, while outside about 200 other young people demonstrated peacefully against the Nixon Administration.

Ford spoke to some 100 members of the Harvard Young Republican Club, which presented him with its man of the year award. Outside, the protesters paraded with signs reading "Impeach Nixon, Dump Ford."

Later, the vice president was to address the 107th annual Lincoln dinner of the Middlesex Club, a Republican social club. Over 1,000 persons were expected to attend.

Ford told the young Republicans that his loyalty to President Nixon and the White House has not compromised his convictions about the President.

"I don't think you should ask any person who believes he's innocent to admit guilt," Ford said. "If you ask a man who is innocent to step down that means you feel he is guilty."

He said he deplored and condemned the Watergate participants, "but I don't believe the President, according to all the information that I know, was involved in Watergate and I don't believe he was involved in the coverup."

The Vice President encouraged young people to stay in politics and not sit on the sidelines.

"I know there has been disolutionment among our young people about the political system and some of the personalities in that system, but I know of no way to improve that system or the political environment other than to participate."

Death penalty approved

BOSTON (AP) - The Massachusetts Senate gave initial approval yesterday to a bill that would make the death penalty mandatory for nine categories of murder.

The 23-14 roll call vote would not be enough to override a possible veto by the governor. The bill was given final approval last week in the House by a more than 2-1 margin.

Gov. Francis W. Sargent vetoed a similar bill last year but said he would consider a measure mandating capital punishment for murder of policemen.

Health education

Lab tests: anemia to V.D.

Over 70,000 laboratory tests are performed annually at the University Health Services according to Leo B. Hall, director of laboratory and x-ray services. Lab tests are done for everything from sickle cell anemia to V.D. For those planning to get married, the laboratory offers pre-parital blood tests. Testing is provided as part of the health fee. Pre-marital blood tests are available to non-student partners for a nominal fee.

The laboratory consists of three specific areas: Chemistry, hematology and microbiology. The chemistry laboratory primary tests for mononucleosis, hepatitis and pregnancy. Blood counts, urinalysis, stool tests for parasites, blood typing, and tests for diabetes are among the many tests performed in the hematology laboratory. These tests enable the nurse or physician to determine whether you are suffering from anemia, syphilis, malaria, a tape worm or some other pathogen.

The microbiology laboratory grows cultures of a variety of organism including those from wounds, respiratory infections, bacterial infections, urinary tract infection, and fungus infections. Most of these tests are for strept throat and genital cultures. Genital cultures include tests for gonorrhea as well as non-gonococal urethritis and vaginitis.

Tests must be requested by a nurse or physician (except for premarital blood tests). Make sure to find out whether you are to wait for the results or return when they are completed. Usually you must come into the Health Center for results; they are not normally given out over the phone. If you have any questions about laboratory services, call 549-2671.

Richardson opposes Nixon resigning

BOSTON (AP) — Former Atty. Gen. Elliot L. Richardson said yesterday that he opposes the resignation of the President as an inconclusive move that could leave many questions unresolved.

Richardson says he favors a speedy impeachment process to air the issues of Watergate.

"Resignation would leave us with a potentially dangerous precedent of a President forced out of office by public pressure where no proof of impeachable offenses have been established." he said.

Richardson also said that a speedy conclusion to the Watergate investigation is of greater importance to the American people than strict preservation of courtroom justice.

He said the preservation of a fair trial might be a problem because of pretrial publicity.

Amherst symposium for black business power

Lastly there must be a change in values standards. He decried the status ascribed to the black pimp and this waste of young black talent. He called for young blacks to go downtown and learn how to count the money and then come back at night, and on the weekends to help the young black brothers.

On Saturday the Black Business Conference was addressed by Dr. Ed Irons of Atlanta Univ. and the National Banker's Association. He opened his speech with the declaration that, "until black people master the art of businesss we will remain serfs."

With 800 billion at its disposal the banking industry is a large part of the financial community. According to Dr. Iron, "whoever controls the finances of this nation determines its direction."

Speaking of the progress of blacks in the banking industry Irons noted the increase in minority controlled banks from 11 in 1963 to 53 in 1973. However the scope of black banking is still comparitively small. He advocated that blacks should concentrate on getting into the larger system of commercial banking but keeping intact a strong system of minority banks, though small in scope.

As an afterthough he mentioned that blacks with advanced degrees in finance are in high demand and with salary ranges from 15,000 to 17,000 dollars.

As an adjunct to the business symposium there was a panel discussion of the present black situation. In it Asa Davis, of Amherst College, asked the audience if, "as blacks have we moved away from acquiring skills and moreover what are we doing to be useful to the society we belong to?"

Study in France

A chance for summer study and travel abroad is now being offered to university students.

For any student, (age 17-20) with one year of French and a desire to learn to speak it as well as to become acquainted with French life and culture, LUVBERON COLLEGE program offers this opportunity at very reasonable cost. The program takes place in Avignon, Southern France from July 1-July 27 during the Festival of the Arts.

A fee of $590 covers tuition, books, room, all meals, sightseeing, field trips, health insurance for the month. Transatlantic fare is not included, but a group flight from New York to Paris is usually arranged at the rate of $280 for the round trip with alternative return dates for those who wish to stay on a week or two longer. For complete information write or call Ms. Therese Pasquale Maguire, Dept. of Comparative Lit., Univ. of Massachusetts, 545-1301 or evenings 369-4053. Applications should be finalized by the end of the month.

Labor seminars

The Student Colloquia Series of the Labor Relations and Research Center is sponsoring two speakers this week in its continuing series of seminars on labor relations.

Professor Charles Gregory, arbitrator and attorney, will speak at 10:30 a.m. today in Campus Center, Rm. 917. He will speak on Labor Arbitration: A current assessment of trends, techniques and problems, Prof. Gregory was a Solicitor of the U.S. Dept. of Labor, has served on the faculty of the University of Virginia Law School and is the author of Labor and the Law. Prof. Gregory is also a member of the National Academy of Arbitrators.

On Thursday, also at 10:30 a.m. Mr. Charles Feigenbaum, Chief, of Union Management Relations for the Internal Revenue Service will speak in Rm. 904 of the Campus Center. He will discuss "Labor Relations in the Federal Sector: An Overview and Assessment." Following the discussion Mr. Feigenbaum will be available to discuss with students career opportunities in the public sector.

Workshop on jails

"County Jails in Western Massachusetts" will be the subject of a workshop this weekend, March 15-17, at the Woolman Hill Conference Center in Deerfield. The workshop, which will run from Friday supper through Sunday lunch, is for people in the region who have either been working in the field of county corrections, been affected by county correctional systems, or who are simply concerned about criminal justice on a local level.

Some of the topics which will be discussed are community involvement, inter-county cooperation, inmate programs and opportunities, and the relationship between county jails and state prisons. The cost for the weekend, which includes six meals, is ten dollars. For reservations and further information, please call Woolman Hill, at 773-9065.

Free boat show

HADLEY, Mass. — A free boat show at Mountain Farms Mall will be held today through Saturday, on the concourse at Mountain Farms Mall. This is the Mall's first annual boat show, and will feature over 40 boats and displays from area dealers and marinas. Pioneer Valley residents are invited to come and browse through the displays and talk with the boating industry representatives.

There will be a drawing on Saturday for a free pair of water skis, 2 life vests, and some fishing equipment. Clinics will be held each evening on boating safety and recreational boating in the Pioneer Valley.

Chess tourney

The UMass Campus Center Chess Club will hold its Spring Club Championship over the course of the next five weeks, beginning today. See C.C. event list by the elevators for room numbers. One game will be played every Tuesday night except March 26, with the last round held April 16. The tournament is open to the University community and the general public — club membership is not required.

Several trophies will be awarded, including one to the best score among beginning players, and USCF (U.S. Chess Foundation) will award national rating points to each participant based on his or her performance. Players who have chess sets are asked to bring them.

Raffle winner!

The University of Massachusetts Pre-Vet Club announces that the winner of the 10-speed bicycle was: David Sender, 12 C Brandywine. The drawing was held yesterday.

Proceeds from the raffle are being used to pay for printing of information about the need for a veterinary college in New England, postage, speaker fees, and other club expenses.

Joan Jonas and her "ORGANIC HONEY'S VERTICAL ROLL" are coming to UMass on Thursday. The 8 p.m. performance will take place in Room 163 in the Campus Center.

Black Rep. Theatre adapts Achebe novel

AMHERST, Mass. — Chinua Achebe's classic novel of Africa "Things Fall Apart" has been adapted for the stage by Esther Terry and will be presented by the Black Repertory Theatre of the W.E.B. DuBois Department of Afro-American Studies this Fri., Sat. and Sun.

Performances will be at 8 p.m. each evening in Bowker Auditorium, general admission $1.50. The adaptation was done by Ms. Terry with the special permission of the author. Both teach in the W.E.B. DuBois Department.

Department head Michael Thelwell commented that "Brother Achebe, whose novels of the cultural clash between traditional African modes and the colonial presence have become international masterpieces and have engendered the modern school of African fiction, has read and approved Ms. Terry's adaptation. It represents the creative collabration across disciplines of two members of the Five College Black faculty."

"Things Fall Apart," Achebe's first novel, describes the impact of colonization on a traditional Ibo village in Nigeria at the end of the 19th century. Published in 1958, it has been translated in 25 languages from its original English.

Achebe came to UMass in 1972 as visiting professor and has a joint appointment in the W.E.B. DuBois Department and the English Department, where he teaches literature and writing.

Some 55,000 Sea-Land containers world-wide, move on land, by truck or rail. Designed to handle any type of cargo, even perishable or liquid, this great fleet of containers is scheduled and controlled by computer

When this trailer comes to an ocean... it keeps right on going. Like this...

The Sea-Land fleet has grown to 73 ships. The largest, the SL-7 Class, carry 1,096 containers, can make 33 knots, cross the Atlantic in about 4½ days, the Pacific in 6 days.

Less than 20 years ago, Sea-Land led a revolution in shipping. We developed "containerization" a system for moving all kinds of freight from door to door... worldwide... in sealed containers.

Our growth has been amazing. We presently service 106 ports in 43 countries with our fleet of 73 ships and 55,000 containers.

We are seeking graduates, preferably business majors, who can learn, take on responsibility and develop in a "shirt-sleeve" company. They must be willing to relocate to any of our U.S. locations.

These men and women will enter our Basic Training Program which will lead to a career in either Sales or Operations.

Pres. of League of Women Voters:

Nixon's campaign reforms inadequate

By LAWRENCE SPIEGEL
Associated Press Writer

President Nixon's campaign reform proposals "don't go far enough," the president of the League of Women Voters said yesterday.

Lucy Wilson Benson of Amherst said the President's bill, submitted to Congress last week, is "inadequate" because it offers neither an overall limit on campaign spending nor a proposal for public financing of campaigns.

"In many ways the bill is a good one," she said.

"It limits the amount of a cash contribution and the amount an individual can donate to a candidate and it creates an independent comission to enforce the laws."

But, she continued, "I don't think it's going to be possible to bring about the kind of reform that's needed without limits on both fund raising and spending."

Under the President's proposals, an individual could contribute up to $3,000 to a House or Senate candidate and up to $15,000 to a presidential candidate. Cash contributions would be limited to $50.

"They're all right as far as they go, but they don't go far enough," Mrs. Benson said.

"When you limit spending you are keeping the lid on the amount of money that has to be raised.

"By not limiting spending you are leaving the door open wide for the large amounts incumbents can raise that challengers can't meet.

"We recommend a spending limit not only to keep out dirty money but also to make the system more equitable for challengers," she said.

The league's position, formalized earlier this year, proposes that campaigns be financed through a combination of private donations and public money, including the income tax checkoff system.

At his news conference last week, the President said he opposed public financing in part because he felt many citizens would object to their tax money going to support candidates they opposed.

"I think that's irrelevant," Mrs. Benson said. "You're helping to pay for a process under public financing.

"I think people would welcome it as a means of keeping down campaign spending," she said.

Mrs. Benson has headed the 160,000-member national organization since 1968.

We challenge you.

Our Officer Selection Officers are looking for a few good college men—maybe 3 out of 100—who will make good Marine officers. If you're one of them, we'll give you a chance to prove it during summer training at Quantico, Virginia.

Our program is Platoon Leaders Class, PLC. With ground, air and law options. You might even qualify for up to $2,700 to help you through college. But if money is all you're looking for, don't waste your time.

The challenge is leadership. If you want it, work for it. If you've got it, show us. It's one hell of a challenge. But we're looking for one hell of a man.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

With many Taurus persons I feel I am in a contest, striving to move what refuses to budge. Some of these natives seem to feel that being stubborn is a blessing and they seldom attempt to disguise it. However, when the chips are down, the Taurus person will pitch in and fight and aid in fulfilling goals. Taurus is a puzzle--at times very difficult to feel close to and at other times actually noble, princely, willing to sacrifice for principles. Taurus knows the meaning of money and can be mature, understanding and, at one and the same time, churlish, childish and obstinate. What kind of Taurus do you know?

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Concern with occult could be featured. You have intense desire now to penetrate mysteries. Applies to relationships, and you are no longer satisfied with superficial explanations. Leo, Aquarius persons could figure prominently.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20); Hold off on commitments. You require additional information. Mate, partner may be impatient. It's best, however, for you to follow your own counsel. Time is on your side. You can afford to wait, to be cautious. Aquarian could be in picture.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Highlight humor, versatility. Ask plenty of questions. People want to aid, to serve, to provide you with material and information. This may not always be so--take advantage of trend while it exists. Another Gemini and a Sagittarian are likely to be involved.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Do some remodeling--tear down for purpose of rebuilding. Romance, creative endeavors are featured. Give of yourself--imprint your style. Refuse to be a copycat. Set your own pace. Let others imitate you.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Be ready for change, travel, variety, intense emotional experiences. Gemini, Virgo persons are in picture. Home, where you are to live, property values are featured. Get basic affairs in order. Review factual information.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Relatives, close neighbors could be part of your "big picture." Be diplomatic. Sharp retorts now would be out of order. Sense of beauty and humor serve as twin allies. One who loves flowers, plants may take too much for granted. Be patient, tolerant.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Money, selectivity, quality--these areas are featured. Take hard look at what is offered. Be a comparison shopper. You have right to get money's worth. Shrewd bargaining is called for--don't shy away from it.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): This is a power period. You have authorities in your corner. Get going-be a self-starter. Invest in your own abilities. Be confident. Persons with experience pay meaningful compliments. You make right decision at right time. Move ahead.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Put finishing touches on project which has been obscured or secret. Aries, Libra persons could figure prominently. Be discreet, not fearful. What you doubt is probably merely a speck in overall picture.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Your own feelings should be considered. Be selfish, if necessary. You do have right to live your own life. Others should be made aware of this and there is no need for reticence. You are on verge of a coup!

AGUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Build toward greater security. Protect image, reputation. Those who advocate action based on impulse are being childish. Know it and heed your own counsel. Teach and learn. Exchange ideas, knowledge.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Travel and change are featured. Shake off lethargy. Accent action, contacts. Social life improves. You meet people who offer challenge, creative outlets. You come alive. Horizons broaden. You perceive potential.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are active, dramatic, concerned with theater and law. Medicine also plays a role in your life and you draw to you persons born under Gemini and Sagittarius. August could be your most important month this year. You will, in 1974, reach more persons, travel more, finish important cycle--you are on threshold of exciting, vibrant life.

Your head

Wife loses control

By DR.'s ANDREW W. McCASHIN and STEPHEN M. KLEIN

Q. I have a strange and embarrassing problem. I've been married for two years now to a woman I really love. We get along very well in our daily lives, but something seems to happen to make my wife behave very badly when we go out socially. Everytime the same thing happens. After she has a few drinks she becomes terribly flirtatious. On some occasions she actually drapes herself over some guy (any guy?) creating a situation that is humiliating to me and usually enbarrassing to the guy she flirts with. The evening winds up with me trying to coax her to leave early and come home with me. I wind up yelling at her and she winds up crying and promising not to do it again. I feel guilty for making her upset and don't mention it until it happens (inevitably) again the next time. How do I stop this?

A. Let's begin by assuming that you have accurately described a situation which repeatedly upsets an otherwise happy and stable relationship. This recurring drama (like a recurring nightmare) would seem to be creating guilt and anxiety that neither of you want. In this drama your wife "looses self control" and "behaves very badly". Then you scold her and she tearfully and remorsefully apologizes, promising never to behave badly again. The question is: what function is served by this drama for you, your wife, and the relationship? Many interpersonal conflicts get played out in this manner, namely by involving a third person in an uncomfortable triangular situation. "Triangling" allows for the indirect acting out of conflicts that for one reason or another cannot be confronted directly between two people. We would need at least a few hours of talking with the two of you to figure out exactly what is happening. But for you and our readers, here are some possibilities, any or all of which could be true.

1) You are overly apathetic and unresponsive to your wife. Unable to gain affection from you directly she resorts to dramatic excesses to elicit a sense that you care by getting you to react.

2) There is a power struggle going on in your relationship which neither of you is willing to face or even feel. Your wife's "rebellious" flirtations and your angry scolding represents a caricature of a controlling parent-child stereotyped sex role struggle. She may be reacting to what she feels is an unnecessary need on your part to control her life.

3) Your wife feels guilty about sexual feelings, impulses, fantasies, and etc. and uses social situations to bring punishment and absolution from you.

Probably the worse time to deal with the problem is immediately after the drama takes place. It would be best if the two of you could try discussing things at times when each of you is feeling good about the other. Unfortunately many couples avoid dealing with their difficulties at such times because they are fearful of turning a good day into a bad one. Since you both are locked into a stereotyped pattern of response and counter response, someone has to break the pattern if there is to be any real chance of changing things.

Kennedy-profile in courage

By DAVE O'HARA

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) - Only 32 but with nearly 10 years in the major leagues, John Kennedy of the Boston Red Sox is at the crossroads of his career. He's fighting an uphill battle for a job, but isn't conceding.

After two sparkling seasons in 1971 and '72, earning the nickname Super Sub, Kennedy slumped last year. When it came time for the Red Sox to adjust their 40-player roster, the veteran utilityman agreed to step down to Pawtucket of the International League last fall.

However, he hasn't given up the thought of remaining in a Boston uniform. He's working as hard as anyone as a special invitee to the Red Sox' training camp. And he's as popular as ever, with teammates, team brass and fans.

"I need only about 100 more days in the major leagues to become a 10-year man, and I think I can play at least two more years," says Kennedy, who will be 33 on May 29. "The Red Sox have a lot of good young players here, but I think I still can help.

"I'm not even thinking about playing at Pawtucket. In fact, I don't know at this stage what I'll do if I don't make the Red Sox. Things will take care of themselves, as they usually do. Many funny things happen in this game."

Kennedy has developed strong ties in Boston since being acquired from Milwaukee in 1970. He lives in West Peabody, Mass., year round, and has worked the last winters doing promotion work for the Red Sox. Says team publicist Bill Crowley: "JK is one of the best goodwill ambassadors we've ever had."

Kennedy got his first chance in the young exhibition season Monday when the Red Sox travelled to Cocoa to play the Houston Astros. He played shortstop, where 18-year veteran Luis Aparicio is trying to ward off the challenges of young Rick Burleson and Mario Guerrero.

Kennedy made a couple of fine plays in the field and had a key base hit in a two-run fifth inning. Then, in the seventh, he unloaded a long homer far over the left field fence, breaking a 4-4 tie as the Red Sox went on to victory, 9-5 over Houston.

Despite his fine performance, Kennedy realizes there's a long way to go in the training season. In addition to the three shortstop candidates, there's Dick McAuliffe and Doug Griffin at second, Rico Petrocelli at third, utilitymen Terry Hughes and rookie Frank Vazquez. Others are capable of filling in at various spots in emergency situations.

However, count JK in the fight of things. The last trip he wants to take is down Interstate 95, the highway from Boston to Pawtucket.

SAN FRANCISCO (AP) - Bill Walton of UCLA completed his three-year Pacific-8 basketball career with four records, including an average of 16 rebounds per game.

The 6-foot-11 All-American, leading the Bruins into the NCAA tournament this week, just missed another career record. He had a Pac-8 field goal shooting average of .641, compared to the .642 mark by UCLA's Lew Alcindor from 1967-69.

Walton set Pac-8 single season records as a sophomore for total rebounds, 239, and rebounding average, 17.1. This season, he established another record with his 69.4 field goal per cent.

BELLEVILLE, Ont. (AP) - Gary Murphy donned his skates and a smile and became ice hockey's first streaker Sunday night.

Murphy, a left winger for the Pickering Panthers, won a $40 bet from his teammates by taking a turn around Memorial Arena after the Panthers had been eliminated from the Metro Junior B League semifinals.

Most of the 1,750 spectators already had headed for the exits, but about 30 fans saw the teenager's impromptu post-game show. Most of them were girls waiting for players to emerge from the dressing room.

Martial arts with Bill Howell

The art of Aikido

By BILL HOWELL

No contact between opponents IS advanced Aikido Sensei Unno graciously demonstrated this by leading an "attacker" into the mats repeatedly during a recent UMass Aikido meeting.

Professor Unno (World Religions, Smith) explained that as his antagonist became more forceful and arrogant, self inflicted collision with the mats was just that much more violent. Without physical contact, the attacker's KI was led to an end determined by the professor and aquiesced to by the violence of his opponent.

A 100 pound boulder is rolling downhill toward you, do you try to catch it or step aside? Now consider a 1000 pound boulder or a younger, stronger, equally skilled martial artist. Questions like this led the founder of Aikido to his "non-fighting" martial art. Unconquerable as a young man, Morihei Uyeshiba questioned the true utility of his sword and mastery of the arts. His answer was harmony with the universe, "...martial training is not training that has as its primary purpose the defeating of others, but the practice of God's love within ourselves." Ninth Dan Tohei explains, "...the aim is not to conquer the enemy but to conquer oneself."

Gentleness and formalized courtesy are rigorously observed. The attacker does himself in, O'Sensei is honored before and after training, Sensei is always honored; students bow and thank each other by name after each technique and after class.

If you are deciding which art to study, further time spent investigating might be valuable. Aikido is offered as a physical education course taught by UMass Aikikai President John Barbaro, and is also available to the community Wednesdays and Fridays, 6:30 to 8:30 and Sundays 2:30 to 4:30. For more information call John Barbaro at 256-6940.

NIT, NYC, MSG, Hicks Cage

It's a complete change.

It's Joe Namath spending Saturday night reading the Bible and drinking milk. It's Walt Disney turning out an X-rated movie. It's Owen Marshall losing a case.

It's going from the Curry Hicks Cage to NYC's Madison Square Garden.

No longer will the UMass basketball fan have to go through so many tribulations that he makes Job seem like a hypochondriac.

The Minuteman rooters who trek to the MSG for the NIT will for once get seats with backs. No more knees pummelling the vertebrae throughout the game. No more ominously bending planks to sit on. No more coats getting accidentally kicked under the stands.

No more falling twenty feet trying to retrieve them.

And the Garden's seating facilities have that wonder of wonders: Aisles! One won't have to walk over the heads of half the crowd in order to get to the refreshment stand. Now it will be possible to take off for a Coke at halftime and get back to the seat before the final buzzer sounds.

One thing that will surely surprise the out-of-towners is the vendor. No, that guy walking around with all those boxes of popcorn is not just a heavy eater. He wants to sell the stuff. Imagine, not having to miss half the game if you're hungry!

It's just like room service.

And instead of fighting cold drafts from under the bleachers, students will be drinking cold draughts from out of the suds stand.

Unlike the Cage's, the Garden's scoreboard doesn't look like it was stolen from the P.S. 14 intramural league. And the buzzer doesn't sound like the horn off of a 1913 Studtz-Bearcat.

Joe Fan will not have to show up two hours early for the varsity game to be sure of getting a seat. And he will not be driven bughouse by JV games that last from here to eternity.

Yet, there is one drawback. You've got to pay to get in.

SHORT SPORTS SNORTS — With so many students here from eastern Massachusetts (Orr Country) it seems strange that the hoopsters get so much support while the blade men get so little...Everybody and their cousin is going to the NIT, but you could have comfortably seated all the people who went to the recent hockey playoffs at Boston and Burlington in a Toyota...

...Mirthful Marty Moron, hoop fan and resident BMOC (Big Man On Campus), thought it funny that someone asked if Peter Pan was taking him to Fun City, so he wisecracked, "No, Dorothy is taking me to Emerald City!"...

...This scribe says the Lea-men will at least get to the semifinals...only staff soothsayer Bill Ballou (known in forecasting circles along with Jeanne Dixon, Jimmy the Greek Snyder, and Guy Mainiella) can effectively predict what will happen after that...Just bet opposite of what he says...

...Aside to Steve DeCosta: No, Ray Fitzgerald is not my idol...I'm Ray Fitzgerald's idol!

Sanderson suspended-season finished

By KEN HOSKINS and
JOHN J. MULLINS

BOSTON (AP) — Derek Sanderson's off and on hockey career was off again Monday as the Boston Bruins suspended him for the remainder of the season and the upcoming Stanley Cup playoffs.

In a one-paragraph statement, the National Hockey League team said the action was taken because of "conduct detrimental to the proper operation of the hockey team."

Bruin management declined further comment, but Sanderson's attorney, sports specialist Bob Woolf, said he believed the suspension stemmed from a personality conflict between the flamboyant center and Coach Bep Guidolin.

"What I think it is, is there has been a huge breach between the coach and Derek," Woolf said as he prepared to cut short a vacation at his Hollywood, Fla., home and return to Boston. "It's been a personality conflict."

Woolf said he would seek a hearing with Bruins management.

"I'm hopeful that when all the parties meet something can be worked out."

Woolf said he hoped to meet with Sanderson here Monday night, but that he had been in contact with him so far only through a third party.

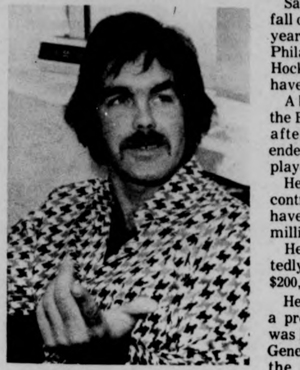
Sanderson missed the team's return flight from Los Angeles to Boston Sunday night. Woolf said some incident apparently triggered that and Sanderson remained in Los Angeles Monday.

The attorney said he was not sure exactly what precipitated the suspension, which he termed "rather drastic action." He added that "nobody notified me ahead of time either, which is a little unusual."

He said he was referred to the team's manager, Harry Sinden, when he sought details from assistant general manager Tom Johnson. Sinden was reported en route to Chicago.

Such a suspension could involve a "substantial amount" of money for Sanderson, Woolf noted.

When it was noted that midnight Sunday was the deadline for trades in the NHL, Woolf said "Apparently that is not going to be one of the solutions."



Sanderson, who has been known as the "Peck's Bad Boy" of the Bruins, won the Calder Memorial Trophy as the outstanding rookie in the NHL for the 1967-68 season, the year after teammate Bobby Orr won it.

He was nicked Turk for his fondness for turkey sandwiches and not because of a rebellious attitude. But he could irritate game officials and bring screams of fury from opposition fans while delighting hometown folks.

His lack of reticence made him well known for quotes to the press for public consumption.

The 27-year-old Niagara Falls, Ont., native was rated one of the best face-off men and penalty killers in the league. Six-feet tall and weighing between 170 and 175 pounds, he was known for his defensive play.

He helped the Bruins win two Stanley Cup championships, in 1969-70 when he fed the puck to Orr, who, although tripped, slapped it into the net for a sudden death overtime victory, and again two years later.

Sanderson left the Bruins in the fall of 1972 to accept a reported 10-year, $2.4 million contract with the Philadelphia Blazers of the World Hockey Association. The Blazers have since moved to Vancouver.

A back injury and problems with the Blazers' front office, especially after a management change, ended his WHA career. He had played eight games.

He and the Blazers agreed on a contract settlement rumored to have paid Sanderson as much as $1 million.

He rejoined the Bruins, reportedly with a two-year contract for $200,000.

He suffered a back injury during a preseason scrimmage last fall, was hospitalized at Massachusetts General Hospital, and then joined the Bruins, American Hockey League affiliate, the Boston Braves, to get in shape.

He missed the first part of the season with the Bruins, and after joining the team, suffered a broken foot bone when he was struck by a puck.

This put him out of action again, and he returned to the team only last Wednesday in St. Louis.

He played in 29 games for the Bruins this season, including Sunday's game against the California Seals, and had eight goals and 12 assists.

His best year with the Bruins was 1970-71, when he scored 29 goals and had 34 assists for a total of 63 points in 71 games. The following year he had 25 goals and 33 assists.

Colorful on and off the ice.

Hows and whys of gymnastics

By CANDY GROSS

Since the Women's Eastern Regional Championships are being held at UMass this weekend, it was felt that some insight into gymnastics would be valuable to the viewers.

The women compete in four events in what is called Olympic order; vaulting uneven bars, balance beam and floor exercise.

In scoring the four events, each of the four judges turns in a score. The high and low score is dropped and the middle two are averaged. These two scores must be within a certain range, set up by the International Gymnastics Federation (FIG), in order to be averaged.

If the scored are out of range the superior judge calls a conference and the scores are adjusted to within the specific range.

After the first routine in each event the four judges consult to arrive at a base score. Usually then, the scores will get higher as the event progresses, with the top competitors last to perform.

MDC Women's Gymnastics Special

In women's collegiate gymnastics only optional routines are done. The routines are broken into specific categories for more precise judging. All beam, bar and floor routines start with a possible 10 point score and the breakdown for them is the same. In vaulting, some vaults are worth less then 10 points and the breakdown is specific for that event.

In vaulting, the specific areas a judge observes are: Preflight (2.0), Repulsion Afterflight (2.0), Position of body during vault (2.0), Direction of vault (0.5), and General balance of vault (1.5). These point breakdowns will change proportionately for vaults worth less than 10 points. Any vault passing through a handstand is worth 10 points.

Women's gymnastics allows the vaulter two attempts, the best score is counted. She may do two different vaults if desired.

There are numerous specific deductions, but a few common to every vault include; steps on landing, .30; touching hands on the floor, .50; supporting hands on floor, 1.0; fall to knees, 1.50; fall to hips, 2.0. As can be seen, a good solid landing is a strong asset in vaulting.

The ten point breakdown for the other three events is divided as follows: Difficulty, 4.0; Originality and Value of combinations, 1.5; General composition, 0.5; Execution, 1.5; Amplitude, 1.5; General impression, 1.0.

Often, of primary importance is the 4.0 difficulty which includes at least six elements of difficult - two superior moves worth 1 point each and four medium moves worth .5 points each. A gymnast not having a superior will lose a full point and no matter how flawlessly she performs, can score no higher than 9.0. This often results in a difference of opinion between the judges and the audience as to what score is deserved.

Uneven bar routines include a mount, dismount and 10-12 stunts. A judge looks for continuous, rhythmic moves, predominantly swinging, as the gymnast passes from one bar to the other. Only two brief pauses are allowed, primarily for concentration and preparation for a difficult move.

There is no set time for a bar routine, but if a gymnast fails to remount after a fall before 30 seconds, her exercise is terminated. A complete fall to the floor or on the bar is a full point off. Any extra swings costs her .5 points each time. A coach spotting during the routine brings a 1.5 point deduction and spotting during a dismount costs .5 points.

Balance beam, notorious for its slowness, has a time limit of 1:20 to 1:45, beginning when the feet leave the floor or board and ending as the feet touch the floor. A timer calls out "Warning" at 1:40 and "Time" at 1:45. If the gymnast is in the air at "Time" at 1:45 she isn't penalized the .3 for overtime. An undertime routine is deducted .05-sec under 1:40. These deductions are taken off the gymnasts' final score.

A beam routine is composed of mount, dismount and dance as well as tumbling which must cover the whole length of the beam. The elements of difficulty should be evenly distributed, changes of rhythm and amplitude displayed, with only 3 stops allowed and above all balance maintained at all times.

When a gymnast falls, she is allowed 10 seconds on the floor, otherwise her routine is terminated. A fall to the beam, to the floor, or grabbing at the bram costs the gymnast .5 points each time. A fall while dismounting deducts 1 full point. Usually after three falls the gymnast will end her routine. Deductions for assistance from the coach are the same as for bars.

Floor exercise brings in the added element of music, which should fit the style and personality of the gymnast. Making use of only one instrument, usually piano, it combines changes of rhythm and speed.

The time limit for floor is 1:00 to 1:30 which begins with the first move of the gymnast and ends with her final pose. A warning is given at 1:25 and time is called at 1:30. This is generally rare as the music is pretimed and tape-recorded.

A floor routine combines all forms of dance with tumbling and acrobatic moves. These should be distributed evenly over the entire floor area. Transitions should flow smoothly and use different levels, in the air and on the floor.

Some common deductions include: .10 everytime the gymnast goes outside the floor area; fall to the floor, 1.0; touch hand to floor to avoid a fall, .5.

If the gymnast has competed in all four events she is an All-Around competitor. Her four scores are totalled to determine her position in the All-Around event.

In determining team score, the top individual scores for each team in each event are added to arrive at the event scores. The four event scores are then totalled for the final score.

Save gas to NIT dribble down

By DAVE EIBEL

This Saturday night at 7:00 the University of Massachusetts Minutemen will be tipping off against the Dolphins of Jacksonville in the opening round of the NIT in New York's Madison Square Garden. But they will not be the only UMass representatives dribbling into the Garden floor.

A contingent of thirteen James House residents will dribble down to New York City starting Wednesday morning at 6:00 a.m. The group, organized by Brad Kowetz, Matt Zofrea, Bob Curtis, and WMUA personality Grant Baxter, plans to arrive in New York prior to game time and then dribble on the floor with the Minutemen.

The group will travel along state highways rather than Interstate routes and will be helped out by the State Police forces of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York along the way.

Each of the thirteen intrepid basketballers will dribble for a mile at a time and then rest until his turn comes around again.

Two Springfield television stations and one in Hartford will cover the dribblers on their way to New York.

There's no doubt that this junket will surely raise the level of support on the part of UMass students to a fever pitch and give UMass and its basketball team a great deal of local and regional exposure. But the question is, do the thirteen Jamesites intend to dribble...and streak onto the Garden floor?

Board wants more facts

By MIKE ALLAIN

The Amherst Board of Selectmen voted Monday night to solicit information from town residents concerning charged of police brutality made before the Board at their weekly meeting.

The action followed a report made public at Monday night's meeting by Town Manager Allen Torrey investigating charges made by Mrs. Marion Rock of Amherst at the Selectmen's meeting on March 5.

Mrs. Rock complained bitterly that her son Joseph, 22, was beaten with night sticks by five Amherst policemen on February 10 following an alleged fight at the Rustic Roost Bar on North Pleasant St.

The following day, Rock was charged with one count of disturbing the peace and two counts of assault and battery in Hampshire District Court. Rock later pleaded guilty to the charges and was given two suspended six-month sentences.

In his investigation, which the Selectmen classified as a "preliminary report", Torrey chose to consider for comment what he believed to be Mrs. Rock's "most serious allegations."

These include charges that her son "had to have 15 stiches in his head and had a concussion," was "belted with billy clubs," came home "all bloody", and that an unnamed police officer "beat the hell out of him at the station."

Torrey, who conducted a separate investigation, independent of Police Chief Donald Maia's findings, found that "Rock did not have 15 stiches in his head, nor that he had a concussion."

Furthermore, the report stated that Torrey found "no evidence that Rock came home 'all bloody' on the morning of February 10th."

Torrey did find, that "Rock was struck with night sticks in the course of the fight on Sunday morning and his subsequent arrest."

Torrey's findings are based on interviews with officers John Burns, Clarence Babb, Richard Buckley, David Jankowski, and Stephen O'Conner. Rock was also interviewed, in the presence of his attorney, Richard Evans of Amherst, and Robert Wellman, an observer from the American Civil Liberties Union.

An investigation carried out by Maia said that police were summoned to the Roost at 12:45 a.m. on February 10 following the outbreak of a "fight" between Rock and "another person". Rock, intoxicated, resisted the apprehension, according to Maia's report.

Force was used to apprehend Rock, but "only such force as appeared needed and necessary." The report concludes that Rock was not "bloodied or injured", as Mrs. Rock had later charged.

The police officers contend that it was their intention to place Rock in protective custody — which does not consitute arrest — and release him in the morning, Torrey's report states.

Unresolved in Torrey's report is who struck the first blow outside the Rustic Roost. Rock stated that he was "rapped on the head as soon as he stepped out of the Roost," according to Torrey's report.

According to the officers, however, Rock struck Officer Burns on the shoulder, and tore at his coat, after Burns informed Rock that he was being held in protective custody.

Rock said he was later beaten in the back of the cruiser and at the station, although "both my arms were handcuffed behind my back," he said.

Torrey's preliminary investigation, released in the presence of both Rock and his mother, stated that Torrey did "not find sufficient grounds to take any further action."

However, charges brought by David Maslanka of 124 Summer St., and Mrs. Rock, indicated to the Selectmen that the issue was not closed.

Maslanka, speaking from the audience, told the Board that he and Rock were only "fooling around", and not fighting, prior to the police's arrival at the Roost.

He also concurred with Rock's earlier statement that Rock was beaten, while handcuffed, at the station following his apprehension. Maslanka followed Rock to the station demanding that he be locked up also, according to Torrey's report.

Maslanka, a former Marine, told Selectmen of two incidents of alleged police brutality involving friends of his, and asked that Selectmen look into them.

"It's happened more than once in this town," Maslanka said, "and I think it's time something gets done about it."

Mrs. Rock bitterly informed Selectmen that action "had better be brought against the five police officers, or I won't let them off the hook until hell freezes over. I'll never let up on them.

"If you people, the Board of Selectmen, don't take a stand on this, you're going to hear about this for a long time," she said.

Selectwoman Nancy Eddy invited any members of the community with information on any other incidents of alleged brutality by town police to come forward and discuss it with Selectmen.

Eddy emphasized that the matter could be discussed privately with Board members if the parties involved wished not to make a public issue of their particular complaint.

A.C.L.U. representative Wellman asked the Board for an investigation of circumstances surrounding the apparent neglect of police, who allegedly did not permit Rock to make a phone call following his arrest.

Selectmen agreed to look into the matter, which, if true, would be a denial of Rock's constitutional rights.

Selectmen Merle Howes later offered a motion that the Board investigate the phone call matter, seek witnesses of the alleged beating of Rock, and discuss with citizens any complaints dealing with potential misuses of police power.

The Board passed the motion unanimously. Developments in the issue will be discussed at the March 25 Selectmen's meeting.

Doctors, yes; teachers, no

By BOB MAC KAY

There will be a million too many teachers by 1975.

That prediction — from the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics — was related by Sec. of Educational Affairs Joseph M. Cronin on Beacon Hill last week. Cronin made the statement before the House Ways and Means Committee while testifying on the $955M education budget request for fiscal 1975.

Sec. Cronin said, "Last year we certified 23,000 teachers. There were only 4,000 to 5,000 jobs for them."

He also said school systems are deluged with applicants.

"For 30 or 40 jobs in a system, as many as 3,000 applications are received. I think these figures indicate that we net the teacher gap about two years ago."

Explaining previous too-high estimates, Sec. Cronin said, "We thought the population explosion of the 1950's and 60's would expand forever."

Rep. Early countered by saying, "The only thing that exploded was faculty enrollments."

The spokesman for Educational Affairs emphasized that prospects for elementary and higher education teachers are not good.

"We must avoid overbuilding," he warned, "or Mass. will face the prospect of mass firings in higher education."

A DOCTOR SURPLUS TOO?

Sec. Cronin also testified that there would soon be a surplus of doctors. He explained that the state was second and third in the nation in a number of categories of doctor specialists.

Accordingly, Cronin told the Committee, Education Affairs planned to limit expansion of the UMass Medical School in Worcester.

Cronin said that for the school "We recommend only an increase of $1.2M instead of the $3.2M requested by the school. The Secretary believed that the school should not hire staff to train (doctor) specialists when there is a need for doctors to work instead in community and preventative medicine.

House Ways and Means Vice-Chairman Early challenged Cronin's assertions. "They told us the shortage of doctors would be so acute by 1980 that our mothers would have to operate on us. Now you're telling there's going to be so many doctors they'll be giving haircuts."

"It amazes me," Rep. Anthony M. Scibelli (D-Springfield), chairman of the Committee, said, "to hear there will be surplus of doctors. All of us know how difficult it is to see one now without an appointment."

Rep. Early explained to this reporter that under Cronin's proposed budget, only 16 freshman students would be allowed into UMass Medical School next fall.

UMass from strikes to streaks

By ROBERTA MARTONE

Streaking is "more fun" than other fads that have surfaced at UMass in the past fourteen years, according to John W. Lederle, former president of the University.

Lederle, who was president of the University from 1960 to 1970, has seen a lot of fads come and go at UMass. He compared the fad of streaking to the gold-fish swallowing and panty raids of "yester-year". "They're all harmless and they don't bother me any", Lederle said.

Lederle also said he didn't think streaking was a return to the fifties. "Too much has changed. There has been a great change in the direction of the students."

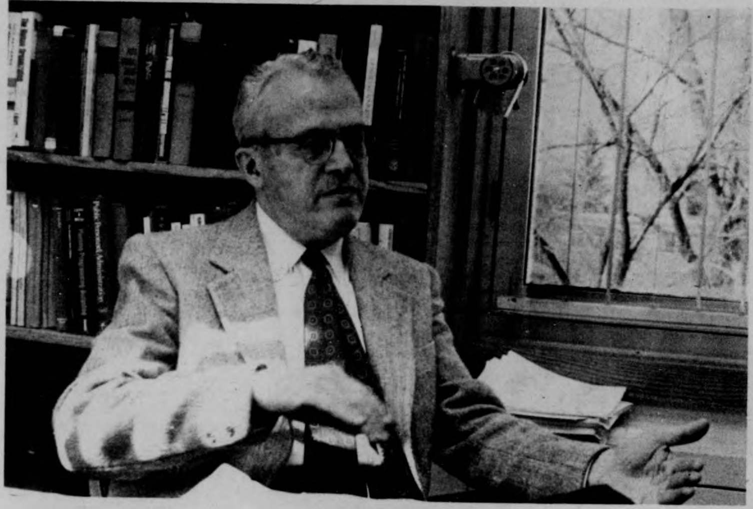
Lederle said he feels there has been a long movement towards student responsibility. "I think a lot of good has evolved from this movement in the direction of students organizing their own affairs."

Comparing the strikes and dissent of 1968 to the "movements" now on campus, he said the strikes were a time of "vandalism and alienation aimed erroneously at the University."

Remembering the strikes, Lederle said there was a minimum of active response on this campus, as compared to others. "I'm not saying that the students weren't concerned. They were. But, there was minimum damage and activism at UMass."

Among other happenings during the 1968, Lederle recalled the one sit-in protesting Dow Chemical Recruitment when the University had to call in troops.

Lederle also remembered the student's reaction to the speech by Hubert Humphrey, at this campus in February 1970. He wondered how students could seek support from the public when they didn't live up to the ideas of free speech themselves, during these years.



John Lederle

"I remember a change in tone of the students. This was one of the first times I met with student organizations that used four letter words," said Lederle.

When asked if he thought streaking "smacked of rebellion" against the administration, Lederle said it depended on whether or not the streaking was done in public places. "If streaking continues, I may begin to wonder. It could be an alienation from society too."

Lederle said he didn't know how long streaking would last, or how reknowned it would become, but he said goldfish swallowing was "pretty short-term, yet it is still remembered."

Lederle concluded: "I always enjoyed the student end of business more than anything else, and I live in the hope that they will continue to move in this direction of responsibility."

Lederle began his academic carrer in 1941, prior to which he practiced law. He is currently a professor in the department of Political Science at UMass.

One dead in auto crash

A Turners Falls man is dead and a Leverett man is in serious condition following a one car accident on Rt. 116 two miles north of UMass last night, police said.

The dead man was identified as Charles E. Milkey, 23, of Turners Falls. Listed in "guarded" condition in the intensive care unit of the Cooley Dickinson Hospital was Edward J. Bronson, 25, of Leverett.

Police said the car left the road around 11:30 Monday night hit a tree, and split in two, throwing both occupants from the vehicle.

Wanted: one house for all kinds

By ELAINE ORPHANOS

"For all; company, a home, a place of our own. For you, for me, an abode of peace," is the slogan for the committee to institute an International House on campus.

Two members of the committee, Ravi Kulkarni and Haridasen, are managing a table at the concourse level in the Campus Center and their goal is to obtain student support by petition. The petition will then be submitted to the Provost for approval. They will be accepting signatures at the Campus Center Tuesday and Friday from 10 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. Petitions will also be circulating around campus after this time in order to secure the 2000 signatures that are needed.

Kulkarni stated that there is a student International Association on campus but it can not function properly without a home base. He emphasized the fact that the 600 foreign students may have active separate organizations but no ways or means for unification. "The purpose of the house is to furnish a housing facility in which American and foreign students can have the experience of living and working together", added Kulkarni.

Some students feel that Prince House functions as an International House. Kulcarni argues that Prince is a dorm for graduate students which obviously excludes undergrads. "It is not an International House because no group activities exist for the purpose of integrating foreign and American students", he said.

The highlight of International Week is the fair which will be held March 16 and 17 in the Campus Center Auditorium. Both Kulcarni and Haridasen feel that this years fair will surpass all others. As opposed to the pure entertainment aspect of previous years, the accent of this years fair is on group participation and discussion.

The Fine Arts Council announced yesterday afternoon that the Count Basie Concert is sold out.

"It will be more than last years sidewalk cafe," added Kulcarni. Some of the interesting events include Calligraphy (turban tying) and the childrens corner.

After four hours of sitting in the Campus Center Monday, Kulkarny counted only seventy five signatures. He felt that gaining student support is a tremendous task. A foreign student who was glancing through the pamphlets commented, "Good work as long as you do it, not me." When Kulcarni asked if he would sign the petition, the student muttered no and left.

countries, and the Medic Alert emblem is registered in 41 others.

Each emblem is registered. The serial number is engraved upon it, as it the telephone number of the Central File. On the reverse side is engraved the inconspicuous medical problem of the wearer, for example: "DIABETES," "TAKING ANTI-COAGULANTS," "WEARING CONTACT LENSES," "ASTHMA," "HEMOPHILIA," "RARE BLOOD TYPE." "GLAUCOMA." Or, ALLERGIC TO: "BEESTINGS," "IVP DYES," "NOVACAINE," "TETANUS ANTITOXIN," "PENICILLIN," etc.

There are over 200 known reasons for wearing medical problem identification, most of them not familiar beyond the medical profession. Therefore, if you have any reason to suspect that you should wear such a warning, but are not sure, make sure by consulting your personal physician.

Alpha Phi Omega, National Service Fraternity and Gamma Sigma Sigma, National Service Sorority, have distributed Medic Alert applications throughtout Amherst and the UMass campus. They are available from your heads of residence, and at the Student Union, Infirmary and University Library.

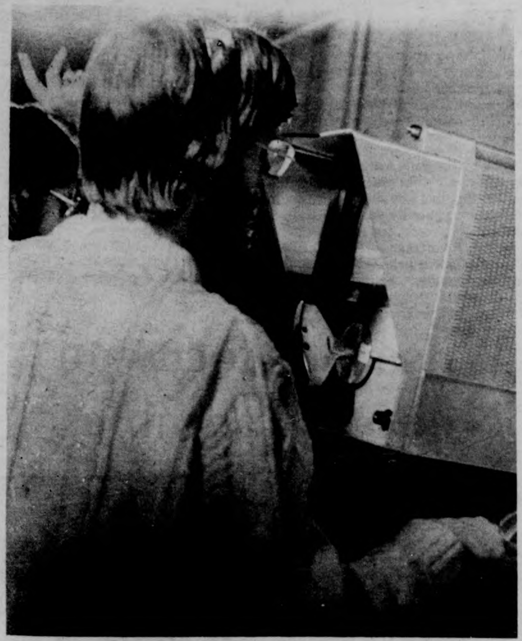
Com Stu grapples with staff problems

By KAREN CMAR



(Staff Photo-Judy Boucher)

..COMSTU student John Desjarlais looks through a camera in the TV studio in South College. Equipment and staff troubles are hampering progress in the department.

Several people interviewed for this article requested that their names be withheld.

Problems are widespread this semester as the Communications Studies department comes to grip with the troubles of a no growth university. Since the semester began, two faculty members have been refused tenure and another is expected to be refused. Graduate students are upset because of lack of student input and undergraduates are faced with a semester of over subscribed courses.

It is not clear why these people did not receive tenure and are therefore forced to leave. One professor felt that it was due to an unfavorable evaluation in the graduate review (a publication which evaluates all the graduate departments in the University).

"There was an element of panic, an element of crisis. I don't think the department expected what it got," he said.

He further added, "The direction has definitely swung to a graduate emphasis. Recruiting has emplasized people with strong research interest as well as graduate orientation...In a way, in terms of emphasis and direction, undergraduate teachers are looked on as less important."

A graduate student in the department said that "the department is losing the people who are most interested in the undergraduate students. We are losing the best teachers and gaining researchers." She felt that those who devoted a lot of time to research were not as involved with students.

James E. Lynch, head of the Communications Studies Department denied that there was any additional graduate emphasis as a result of the review.

"If there is any reemphasis, it is in increasing the scholarship of the faculty. We are looking for a proven or potential teacher-scholar who is prepared to do research," he said.

Lynch declined to comment on the individual cases involved.

Several professors in the department agreed that there was a lack of student input in personnel decisions and in the long range plans and goals of the department.

"Department philosphy has little to do with students wants and needs. There is minimal student input into the long range plans and goals of the department. The philosophy is determined by heads of departments and sometimes even the untenured faculty aren't consulted," said one professor.

There is an undergraduate curriculum committee which includes four students, designated as a vehicle for students viewpoint to be heard, said one professor. Several undergraduates were queried and said they had never been told about the committee.

Several professors said that Mass Communication majors and others in the University wanted more media production courses and there is a definite trend away from this.

"We're not a production oriented program. We were never meant to prepare people for professional jobs in media, producers, directors, writers, performers. Students who want that should go to a professional school. The principal reason is that the department is a member of the School of Social and Behavioral Science so we're committed to study all aspects," said Lynch.

"With the department moving away from professional training, I wonder what the department is preparing people to do when they get out of school," said another professor.

The television equipment in the Communications department is in very bad shape and the film equipment is in fair condition, according to a professor. The School of Education has a better set up all around, he said. The television equipment has been around since 1962.

The Department has been having a problem with oversubscribed courses. In one area of concentration (Mass Communications) there are only two courses that are not oversubscribed and these are low level lecture courses, according to department records.

According to Lynch, this may be due to the fact that Mass Communications has only eight of the department's 34.75 faculty. 225 of the department's over 500 majors are in Mass Communication, he said.

Another contributing factor according to one professor, was the reduction of faculty from nine hours of teaching per week to six hours, bringing them in line with other departments in the Social and Behavioral Sciences. There was no faculty increase, so the department had fewer courses, he said.

The department is working on the situation and may consider some large scale changes. Faculty may be returned to a nine hour a week teaching schedule. The Communication Disorders area may split with the department and join the School of Public Health. The Mass Communication area may merge with the Communication and Rhetorical Theory area and make a combined major. If this happens, Mass Communications majors will be required to take Rhetorical Theory courses and visa versa.

One graduate student felt that the merger would be mainly for the convenience of the department, because the faculty is so large in Communications and Rhetorical Theory and the number of majors is so small. She felt that it would not be for the benefit of students.

Lynch felt that it would benefit students by "opening up the department and allowing students to study across the lines of communication."

Volunteer tutoring

By LUIS MANUEL MEDINA

"The experience of learning educational methods in the university, and the implementation of those methods in the city's school is completely different," according to Gilberto Sotolongo, a bilingual teacher in Lynch Junior High School in Holyoke.

"Students behave as adults in the street, but in the school they behave differently," he said.

Sotolongo feels that the junior high students need tutoring in Math, English and Spanish reading, and other subjects.

UMass commuter students from Holyoke expressed that education is certainly a need in the city. "Programs in education for Spanish-Americans could be better", said Evaristo Rodriguez, one of the Holyoke commuters.

Another UMass commuter student from Holyoke, Angel Colon said that Latins "need more educational programs and better social services."

Lynch Junior High School has a bilingual program for Spanish speaking students. People interested in volunteer tutoring should get in tuch with: Mr. Gilberto Sotolongo, Telephone 532-1085- Lynch Junior High School Holyoke

CREEP transfers surplus to trust fund

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Finance Committee to Re-elect the President has ended its turbulent two-year history by transferring $3.57 million to a trust fund.

Trustees of the fund told the General Accounting Office in their first financial report this week that they will continue to pay legal fees and other expenses, including an estimated $775,000 to settle major law suits arising from the Watergate break-in.

Fees for lawyers involved in defending the committee and its officials in civil actions and in preparing for Senate or grand jury appearances already have approached $1 million.

The financial report lists a $25,519 bill still owed for the committee's principal Watergate lawyer, Kenneth W. Parkinson, who was among those indicted two weeks ago in the Watergate cover-up.

The report also lists a $1,066 salary payment for this year and a $200 advance to former Secretary of Commerce Maurice Stans one of the three current trustees who headed the Finance Committee from its inception in the spring of 1972.

Paul Barrick, secretary-treasurer of the trust, said the salary check was the last that Stans will get pending outcome of his trial in New York federal court on charges arising from a $200,000 secret campaign contribution from financier Robert Vesco.

Former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell is a codefendant with Stans in the trial, expected to last well into the spring.

Barrick said Stans' $30,000-a-year salary was discontinued at the former Cabinet secretary's request when the trial began Feb 20.

Barrick said he did not know why Stans drew the $200 advance which, according to the financial report, was received two days after the trial began and was repaid on Feb. 28.

"I guess he needed pocket money," Barrick said.

The Finance Committee was one of two committees charged with over-all operational control of Nixon's re-election campaign.

Serving along with Stans as trustees of the fund, called the 1972 Campaign Liquidation Trust, are Charles Potter, former U.S. senator from Michigan, and Guilford Dudley Jr., a Nashville, Tenn., insurance executive.

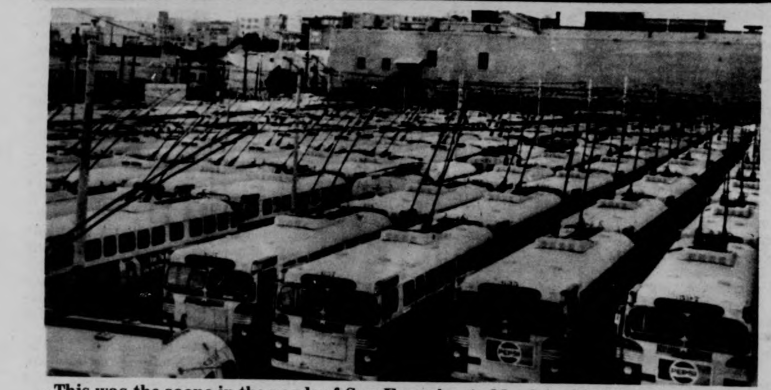
No one has said what will be done with the campaign surplus after all the pending litigation is done with. But the Republican National Committee has repeatedly said it should get the money.

The Committee for the Re-election of the President, which was headed briefly by Mitchell in mid-1972, handled political chores. It closed its doors last October. The Finance Committee raised the money-more than $60 million in all, making it the richest political campaign in U.S. history.

The financial report listed return of $40,000 to Braniff Airways, Inc., of Dallas, noting it was a "refund of a contribution illegally made." The contribution, made secretly in cash before a new federal disclosure law went into effect in April 1972, was first disclosed by the Finance Committee in response to a lawsuit late last year. At that time it was listed as varying cash amounts from Braniff executives with a note that the committee was trying then to determine whether it was an illegal contribution out of corporate funds.

The financial report also listed as a separate item for the first time $15,200 owed by former White House counsel John W. Dean III.

U.S. and the world



--This was the scene in the yards of San Francisco's Municipal Railway system as thousands of commuters had to find other means for getting to work. Municipal employes and teachers were on strike, and although not involved in the wage dispute, leaders of the Transport Workers Union, which represents 1,800 drivers, said they would honor the picket lines.

Venezuelan president pledges speeded-up nationalization

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) - With Pat Nixon watching from the presidential box, Carlos Andres Perez was sworn in yesterday as Venezuela's 39th president. He said he would speed up the nationalization of the country's huge foreign-run petroleum industry during his five-year term.

Perez offered Venezuelan support-"backed by oil"-in aiding Latin-American efforts to achieve "independent development, fair prices for raw materials and just and economically balanced participation in world trade.

"We are going to realize our country's old aspiration that its petroleum be Venezuelan," Perez added.

His inaugural address was delivered to a joint session of Connress and delegates from more than 70 foreign countries.

Mrs. Nixon, representing her husband, arrived at the 19th century legislative palace in an eight-car motorcade. She was first seated with fellow United States delegates Robert McClintock, American ambassador to Venezuela, and Miami businessman Nicholas H. Morley. Just before the cermonies began, she was invited to join the wives of the incoming and outgoing presidents in the presidential box.

In his speech, Perez said that "different legal dispositions exist which quarantee the reversion" of the 3.3 million barrel-a-day oil industry. "But today we see the convenience of stepping up the process to establish once and for all a new national and nationalistic petroleum policy."

He did not outline how or when nationalization would take place and emphasized that the process must be discussed. "No dogmatism will blind the petroleum policy of the government which I am beginning today," he promised.

The 51-year-old leader replaces outgoing Social Christian President Rafael Caldera, 56.

Perez, a former interior minister, who was elected by more than 500,000 votes last December, was presented with the yellow, blue and red presidential sash by Caldera and was officially sworn in by Senate President Gonzale Barrios.

Wilson to focus on economic troubles

LONDON (AP) - Prime Minister Harold Wilson's Labor government pledged yesterday it would concentrate on overcoming the country's economic troubles and promised Britain another vote on terms of its membership in the Common Market.

The policy statement by the minority government, read by Queen Elizabeth II at the opening of the 46th Parliament, avoided mention of some of Wilson's more controversial campaign promises, including nationalization of several big industries.

The address listed a string of moderate measures aimed at restoring "national unity at this difficult time" and achieving fairer shares for all Britons through a redistribution of wealth.

The queen said the new government would seek a "fundamental renegotiation of the terms of entry to the European Common Market." Later Wilson said the outsome of those negotiations would be put to the British people at the ballot box, and "their decision will be final."

The monarch opened Parliament in a simple ceremony that recalled the austerity of the war years.

The imperial crown was not on view. The queen arrived by limousine rather than in the traditional horse-drawn coach and she wore a daytime rather than evening dress.

Sears: never asked Mitchell

NEW YORK (AP) — Government witness Harry Sears testified yesterday that he never asked former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell to "fix" financier Robert L. Vesco's fraud case with the Securities and Exchange Commission.

"Never, at any time," Sears said at the Federal criminal conspiracy trial of Mitchell and former Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans.

In cross-examination, Sears was taken back over a series of meetings he had with Mitchell on behalf of Vesco, a secret $200,000 contributor to President Nixon's $972 re-election campaign. Mitchell's attorney, Peter Fleming Jr., then asked:

Q. There was nothing clandestine, was there, Mr. Sears.

A. No, sir. There wasn't.

Q. Do you know what 'to fix a case' means?

A. Yes.

Q. Did you attempt to fix the Vesco case with Mr. Mitchell?

A. No sir.

Q. Did you ever ask Mr. Mitchell to fix the Vesco case?

A. Never, at any time.

Vesco's $200,000 contribution to Nixon's campaign is at the heart of the government's case against Mitchell and Stans, who are accused of impeding an SEC fraud investigation into Vesco's international financial operations, in return for the donation.

Sears, former Republican majority leader of the new Jersey state Senate, was indicted with Mitchell and Stans but was granted immunity from prosecution for his testimony on behalf of the government. Vesco also was indicted but fled the country.

Under direct examination for the better part of five days, Sears had testified that he turned over the contribution to Stans in Washington on April 10, 1972, then went to Mitchell's office. The two defendants had quit their Cabinet job to direct Nixon's re-election campaign.

There was further testimony that Sears told Mitchell of the exchange of money and that the latter then picked up the telephone and arranged for Sears to meet that same day on Vesco's behalf with the then-SEC Chairman William Casey.

Fleming asked Sears if Mitchell hadn't promised the meeting with Casey a month before the contribution was made, depending only upon when the SEC chairman was available.

"That's correct," Sears said. Sears was confronted with his grand jury testimony that he had not even discussed the campaign contribution with Mitchell April 10.

"Even today you have no recollection of ever telling Mr. Mitchell at that time, April 10, that the contribution was in cash?" asked Fleming.

Mills suspects tax returns would lead to resignation

WASHINGTON (AP) — Rep. Wilbur Mills contended yesterday that congressional findings on President Nixon's taxes will do more to force his resignation than Watergate "simply because people understand taxes."

Mills, chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, said, "I have no idea" if tax fraud might be involved. "I said specifically I was not accusing the President."

At a news conference last Friday in Little Rock, Ark., Mills said he expects Nixon to resign, primarily because of a report being prepared by the House-Senate Internal Revenue Taxation Committee, of which he is vice chairman.

Mills told newsmen yesterday he does not know if the President had personal detailed knowledge of controversial deductions such as presidential papers.

The Arkansas Democrat refused to comment on White House statements that he is taking cheap shots at the President and that if he has any evidence for his allegations he should "put up or shut up."

Mills repeated that the committee report, to be issued in 30 to 40 days, will do more to force the President's resignation than Watergate.

Mills said later in an interview: "What I said was that the tax issue could hurt the President more than Watergate - simply because people understand taxes.

"If the figures that have been talked about - $250,000 or $300,000 owed - are correct, people certainly will be asking questions," Mills said.

Asked again about the possibility of tax fraud findings, he said as far as he is concerned the House-Senate report will draw no conclusions at all.

"We will simply lay out the facts and let people draw their own conclusions," he said.

Mills suggested that much of what will be in the report already has been publicly disclosed.

"You fellows have already written about this...," he said. "—What developed in California about the residence and the accountant not being able to see him. But everything has not been printed."

He said the memorandum surfacing Monday reporting that Nixon wanted to see past presidents' tax returns to look at their deductions is not one of the new disclosures that he believes will hurt the President.

Youth hijacks Japanese jet

TOKYO (AP) — A youth who said he wanted money for earth research hijacked a Japanese jumbo jet yesterday by brandishing a black bag that turned out to contain little more than a fountain pen, some vitamin tablets and a few clothes. He was captured seven hours after he comandeered the plane.

Police said the youth, holding his black bag, presented a threatening note to a crew member as the plane was en route from Tokyo to Naha, Okinawa, with 426 persons aboard.

"Obey our orders," the note said. "If not, I cannot guarantee the lives of the passengers."

The youth, who told crew members there were other hijackers aboard, was taken to the cockpit of the Boeing 747, and the passengers remained unaware of the hijack until after the plane landed in Naha, the capital of Okinawa.

Ninety minutes after landing in Naha, the hijacker released 162 passengers - 111 women, three children and 48 men who were elderly or in frail health. The police identified the youth as Katsuhite Owaki.

Police said the youth never mentioned a specific weapon or referred to the contents of his bag, which turned out to hold a sweater, a pair of trousers, pencil, fountain pen, Japanese map, airline ticket, bottle of vitamin tablets, two notebooks and about $50 in cash.

Officials of Japan Air Lines said the 18-year-old hijacker demanded $55 million in $1,000 bills, another $660,000 in 10,000 yen notes, 15 parachutes and alpine equipment including masks.

From childhood, the youth told police later, he had been interested in geology and biology but had no money to pursue studies in these field.

Nixon confers with Hussein on Mideast military policy

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon told Jordan's King Hussein yesterday that the United States intends to press for military disengagement in the Middle East despite uncertainty over lifting of the Arab oil embargo.

"We're hopeful the embargo will be lifted," said Ronald L. Ziegler, the White House press secretary, in reporting on their one-hour meeting attended also by Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger.

However, the spokesman went on, "there is not a direct link between U.S. efforts for peace and lifting the embargo."

Hussein, whose country does not produce oil, is in Washington primarily in a quest for a wide range of sophisticated weapons to modernize his armed forces. He is also seeking a boost in U.S. military aid, now averaging about $40 million a year.

Ziegler said military aid to Jordan is "a subject of frequent consultation." Other U.S. officials said Hussein was asked before coming here to scale down his list which is headed by Hawk surface-to-air missiles, and is being asked to winnow it again.

The king had lunch with Kissinger at the State Department and has a date at the Pentagon Thursday with Secretary of Defense James Schlesinger. Hussein will see Kissinger again and Vice President Gerald R. Ford in his week-long visit.

The next step in the disengagement process is a session Thursday between Kissinger and Israeli Foreign Minister Abba Eban to set the stage for the arrival of an Israeli negotiating team within two weeks. Kissinger is holding up plans for a trip to the Soviet Union pending the outcome of Eban's visit.

Ziegler said the Nixon-Hussein conversation was cordial and they "discussed in detail U.S. efforts to help the nations that were parties to the Israeli-Arab war to negotiate a peachful settlement."

Jordan supported the Yom Kippur attack by Egypt and Syria only indirectly. The White House spokesman said the President also went over with Hussein Jordan's hopes for an Israeli withdrawal from former Jordanian territory.

Fighting continues on Golan Heights

By The Associated Press

Syrian forces shot down an Israeli helicopter Tuesday during an artillery and tank battle which raged for 3½ hours in the central and northern sectors of the Golan Heights, a Syrian military spokesman announced.

Earlier, Premier Golda Meir of Israel interrupted a speech on peace prospects with Syria with the announcement: "I have just received a note telling me that shelling has been coming from Syrian bases onto our bases."

There was no immediate word on casualties from either side.

It was the first flare-up on the tense Israeli-Syrian border since Saturday.

In Geneva, Egypt notified the International Committee of the Red Cross that it is willing to accept a three-month-old Red Cross proposal.

Arab leaders to discuss oil policy

TRIPOLI, Libya (AP) - The Libyan news media stepped up attacks yesterday against the American government on the eve of a crucial Arab conference to discuss the oil embargo against the United States.

Diplomats in Tripoli indicated that despite strong pressure by Egypt's President Anwar Sadat, the conference may decide to retain the ban, which started last October.

The question of relations with Washington has apparently opened a rift among the nine oil-producing Arab states, and there were persistent rumors in Tripoli that the meeting would be canceled.

"The conference comes at a time when the Arab world is experiencing more plots and challenges from the Zionist enemy supported by the United States," the Libyan radio said. "The use of oil has proven an effective weapon for the Arab cause."

The Libyan press dismissed the U.S. role as mediator between Israel and the Arab world as "meddling in Arab affairs."

American sources, however, warned against drawing premature conclusions. They said a compromise solution could be in the offing, such as replacing the total embargo with shipments of about half the pre-October volume.

Some Western diplomats said Libyan President Moammar Khadafy might soften his strong anti-American stand in gratitude for Sadat's role in reconciling him with Saudi King Faisal earlier this year.

But an American diplomat said the United States would not be pleased with a compromise. "Henry would not be happy with it," he said, refering to Secretary of State Henry Kissinger.

There had been hopes that the embargo would be lifted in recognition of Kissinger's role in mediating a Middle East peace.

In Cairo, Egypt's semiofficial newspaper Al Ahram provided another indication Tuesday that Saudi Arabia, considered a key to lifting the embargo, was in favor of resuming shipments to the United States. The paper said Sadat and the oil ministers of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, Qatar, Abu Dhabi and Bahrain had met Monday and agreed "on all aspects of the oil policy."

This report indicated that those countries might form a bloc to oppose Libya, Algeria and Syria at Wednesday's meeting.

Algerian Oil Minister Belaid Abdel Salam was expected to fly to Tripoli to preside over the conference in his capacity as current head of the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries.

Nuclear Pollution Coalition takes on plant

PUTNEY, VT. (AP) - The New England Coalition on Nuclear Pollution reached a tentative decision Sunday to take further action against the full operating license granted to the Vermont Yankee Nuclear Power Plant at Vernon.

Mrs. Esther Poneck said that a formal announcement of the coalition's decision is awaiting approval of its attorney, who is tied up in another case for the coalition.

She indicated the further action could be legal action before the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington.

The Atomic Safety and Licensing Appeals Board of the U.S. Atomic Energy Commission upheld last week the granting of a full operating license to the 540,000 kilowatt power plant.

The coalition had brought the case to the appeals board on issues of plant safety and environmental impact. The appeals board rejected those grounds when it upheld the license of the Vernon plant.

Suit filed against Mass. Electric

BOSTON (AP) - Rep. Michael J. Harrington, D-Mass., said yesterday he has filed a class action suit against Massachusetts Electric Co to recover $3.6 million in alleged overcharges during the last two years.

Suffolk Superior Court Judge John J. McNaught scheduled a show cause hearing on the suit for 10 a.m. Friday.

Harrington said overcharges resulted from the fuel adjustment clause that allows the company to recover more than 100 per cent of its increased fuel costs.

"Massachusetts Electric bills its customers on a bi-monthly basis, but it applies the second month's fuel adjustment clause to the total kilowatt-hour use for the two months, completely ignoring the fuel adjustment clause in effect for the first month," Harrington said.

"Whenever the fuel adjustment clause has gone up from the first month to the second month, the customer is being overcharged," he said.

Harrington's suit asks the court to enjoin the company from continuing this billing practice.

Prices predicted to level between 65-75¢ a gallon

BANGOR, Maine (AP) - The president of New England's largest petroleum products distributor said yesterday gasoline prices in the region should level out this year at 65-75 cents a gallon.

Henry Power of the Boston-based C.H. Sprague and Sons also said, "Gasoline will be the most difficult petroleum product to come by this year."

He commented in an interview with WABI-TV here.

"As long as we control the price level of gas, there is going to be less coming to this country from foreign sources," the oil executive said.

"If the price of gasoline is allowed to go up, two things will happen: People will stop wasting it and more gas will come to the U.S.

Power also predicted the price of home heating fuel in New England would "stabilize in the neighborhood of 30 cents a gallon but there will be no return to prices the consumer has seen in previous years"

Nader and research groups lead nuclear plant fight

Mass PIRG reports

By STEVE DeLANCEY

—Last week: As an example of how MassPIRG works, MassPIRG Reports reviewed efforts to expose the secret, illegal construction of a superhighway in Western New England.—

Ralph Nader will be coming to Massachusetts next week to give a number of speeches on the current fuel shortage, the energy 'crisis', and nuclear power plants.

The attorney, consumer-advocate, and founder of the Student Public Interest Research Groups has been invited by House Speaker David Bartley to address a joint session of the Mass. legislature on March 21. Prior to that engagement, Nader will be a guest speaker at five Mass. colleges, three of them in the western part of the state. On March 18, he will start his tour at the UMass Student Union Ballroom at twelve noon. MassPIRG will be coordinating the visit.

During the past year, Mr. Nader has spent a lot of his own energies gathering research on the energy shortage and on nuclear power plants. Characteristically outspoken, he has labeled the current fuel shortage a hoax perpetrated by the American fuel companies in an attempt to gain "higher prices, the Alaska pipeline, offshore drilling for oil, added tax credits, a favorable regulatory environment, lowering of pollution standards, and squeezing out of independent dealers".

And he has cautioned most forcefully against replacing an "energy crisis with a nuclear crisis". Nader has repeatedly questioned the safety of nuclear power plants and criticized the Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) for backing construction and licensing of the plants. The AEC was formed in 1946 as a civilian-run independent agency to promote and regulate the development of the atomic energy program. Nader feels the Commission has pushed nuclear power to such an extent that it has forgotten its obligation to protect the public against the dangers involved.

On May 30, 1973, Nader and the Friends of the Earth, an environmental group, filed suit to shut down 20 nuclear plants. He asked a Federal District Court to order the AEC to revoke operating licenses of the plants on safety grounds until public hearings could decide their future.

Last January, he testified before the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and released material which he said was part of a secret AEC study on nuclear power safety. The report concluded that reactor safety is still "an unanswered question".

Nader has also made a number of statements in conjunction with the Union of Concerned Scientists (UCS), a Cambridge-based group, asking for a moratorium on nuclear power until the safety of the plants is proven beyond a doubt. Nader and the UCS have strongly urged the development of alternative power sources such as solar and geothermal methods of energy production.

His position on atomic power has been disputed by many pro-nuclear people incluging Dr. Dixie Ray Lee, Chairperson of the AEC. Dr. Lee has cited the safety records of existing plants and referred to Nader's warnings as "scare statements". She was quoted recently in the Boston Globe as saying, "Both Nr. Nader and the UCS are wrong. Once again they have used innuendo and inaccuracies to build a case against nuclear power largely on emotional grounds."

Existing facts can be used to support both sides of the argument. The basic question, though, is this: the AEC cannot prove that the plants are safe even though it assures the public that an accident is "almost impossible." The emergency cooling systems in question have never been tested. Nader contends that the burden of proof lies with the proponents of its development — which seems a reasonable stand. Many of the people pushing nuclear power have made large investments of time and money which they want to protect. Their position can therefore be readily understood. I wonder, however, why environmentalists — what have no money at stake — would wish to block nuclear power if their fears were really unfounded.

People in favor of nuclear power are depending on the creation of an industry with a perfect technology. It can't allow for a single human or mechanical error. Many current plants have already been plagued by problems, some of which have caused the plants to have to shut down completely. Certainly the precedent set down by history would not recommend dependence on the infallibility of man or machine.

A 1967 AEC report stated that a single major accident would claim a maximum of 45,000 lives, cause an additional 100,000 injuries, and result in some 7 billion dollars in property damage. The reactors that are being constructed today are considerably larger than the ones used in that estimate.

William Anders, an AEC Commissioner, has stated that the probability that such an event would occur is once in one million years of power put out by ten reactors.

I wonder how the Commission can estimate these figures so cooly and exactly — especially since they are dealing with thousands of human lives. If the plants are safe why does the AEC recommend that they be constructed away from areas of high population? Why have insurance companies refused to insure the plants? Why didn't the utility companies become interested in nuclear power until the government stepped in and limited their liability in case of an accident (and at the taxpayer's expense)?

The time for a thorough examination of our priorities is now. Currently 39 nuclear power plants are operating in the US. The AEC estimates that 1000 will be in use within the next 25 years — 200 will be located in New England alone. Whether they are safe or not, a major expansion is under way.

In a 1973 report on energy policy by the Senate Committee on Commerce, it was stated that the US, with 6 per cent of the world's population, consumes about 40 per cent of the world's energy every year. If the country is going to expand its dependence on energy, or even continue its present rate of consumption, it's obvious that it will need a new source of power.

In response to this need, President Nixon in his Nov. 7th energy message, urged the shortening of licensing and construction time for the plants. This would allow even less time for public hearings and further examination of the problems inherent in nuclear power. Government officials and scientists are making decisions that concern all of the world's population — not just for our times but for thousands of years to come. This decision should not be a hasty one made only on the grounds of immediate technological need.

An interesting sidelight is the fact that General Electric is one of the country's foremost manufactureres of nuclear reactors. All of us, as consumers, have had experience with American appliances that feature a guarantee as well as 'built-in obsolescence'. Would we be willing to bet our genes, our environment, and our lives that nuclear reactors are absolutely foolproof and will continue to be so for hundreds of years to come?

On December 28, 1973, the Northeast Utility Company announced plans to build two nuclear reactors in Montague, 12 miles north of Amherst. Boston Edison is planning to exapnd their nuclear facilities in Plymouth.

In response to these announcements, MassPIRG sponsored House Bill No. 2373, which would require legislative approval for the construction of all plants in Massachusetts employing nuclear fission as its heat source.

The PIRG has also issued a letter to Governor Sargent urging him to curtail further construction in the Commonwealth until there is sufficient evidence documenting that the plants "will not pose unjustifiable hazards."

MassPIRG released a "Preliminary Report on Nuclear Power Plants" on January 11, 1974. The report concluded that too many questions are still unanswered and urged a moratorium on construction of such plants. The 25 page report is informative, well-written, and extremely eye-opening. Copies are available at the MassPIRG office and should be required reading for everyone interested in the current nuclear debate.

Again, Ralph Nader will be addressing himself to these issues on Monday the 18th. High noon at the S.U.B.

—Next week: Small Claims Court and MassPIRG's Citizen Advisory Service.—

UMass graduate helps Belchertown

Amherst — Sasha won't remember it, but in her first year or so of life, she helped bring a new life to adult retarded residents of Belchertown State School.

She did it by accompanying her mother, Mrs. Alice Gerritsen, to night classes at the School--classes aimed at preparing the residents to live in the world outside.

Mrs. Gerritsen, who graduated in January from the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, spent her senior year as a UMass volunteer for University Year for Action, the federal program which enlists volunteers to help people. As administrative assistant to the director of adult education at Belchertown State School, she expanded the education program for the adult retarded with a small night school last summer, and a large-scale effort this fall semester.

From UMass, and Hampshire, Westfield State, and Amherst Colleges, she recruited 188 college students who volunteered their time to teach about 300 State School residents things like how to tell time, how to use a stove, how to get help from a policeman, how to buy on credit, how to use a bank account. Mrs. Gerritsen directed the expanded program, and brought Sasha along. Getting acquainted with a baby was "really thrilling for the adult residents, and Sasha liked the attention," says Mrs. Gerritsen. She calls the meetings "a marvelous interaction experience" for the residents.

Since the residents are preparing for life outside the School, they had to be taught basic things which most people take for granted. Mrs. Gerritsen felt her volunteer teachers would not have enough time to teach reading, as in reading a book, so she asked that they teach "preventive reading"--the ability to understand certain key words like "danger," "poison," "ladies," "exit."

Another course, "consumer law," might also be called "how to survive in the community, "Mrs. Gerritsen says. Here the residents learned about buying on credit, resisting sales pitches, and consumer rights. Since some of the residents will be receiving their first paychecks when they leave the School, they were taught how to endorse their checks, how to budget their money, and how to pay bills.

Democracy in USSR only guarantee of world peace

By VACLAV HOLESOVSKY

I have been off and on bothered by the following thought. On what grounds do I feel strongly about people like Solzhenitsyn, Andri Sakharov, General Grigorenko, Andrei Amalrik, and other dissidents persecuted by the Soviet regime, more strongly than about victims of persecution in other corners of the world? When I consult my cinscience, I find that I actually don't. As far as my feeling is concerned, I do not feel more strongly about them than about others. Indeed, as a feeling human being, I am much more moved by the assassination of Salvador Allende, as I was by the massacre of people in Biafra five years ago, people in Haiti under Duvalier, victims of General Amin in Uganda, or the extermination of Communists in Indonesia in 1965. After all, it would seem that Soviet dissidents, with all their undeniable suffering, are personally not as badly off as they were under Stalin, or as others are in countries of, in some ways, still greater degree of barbarism.

The reason is that they represent a political cause which I consider most important for the future of the world. To my mind, they have political priority. In a sense, I think of them not so much as suffering great men worthy of compassion, but more as fellow militants in a political cause we share. I think, in that respect, we would see eye to eye. As much as Solzhenitsyn may deserve it, our thinking should not concentrate on hero worship, but go beyond that and concentrate on that common cause, just as Solzhenitsyn himself does. This is also why the matter is not closed when he reaches personal safety and when his wife and children will have joined him. It continues. It remains open. Perhaps it is only now that it should seriously begin, because by moving Solzhenitsyn — and tomorrow perhaps Sakharov — abroad, the Soviet regime knocks them out from the most important sector of the political battlefield. They gain personal safety, but politically they are killed, or at least seriously wounded.

What kind of cause am I talking about? I am talking about the struggle for freedom and democracy in the Soviet Union and the entire Soviet area.

Freedom and democracy — what does that mean? We moderns are suspicious of big words. We are wary of being taken in by phoney slogans, and rightly so. Let me,then, translate these words into the lingo of political sociology. After that, let me explain why we, in the West, have a vital interest — a selfless interest as well as a selfish interest — in Soviet-area freedom and democracy?

How does the cause of freedom and democracy translate into the cool language of social science? The totalitarian regime of the Soviet type represents an attempt at total domination of the state over society. First it pulverizes society into atoms by destroying the natural groupings of people according to their true interests. Then it destroys their right to organize freely for the defense of those interests. And finally the regime squeezes people into artificial organizations created by the state and controlled by the state. The information monopoly tries to brainwash people into thinking that the official fairytale about their country and their interests is the true story. It does that by preventing a free flow of authentic information between people. And it screens out information from abroad, screens out the knowledge of facts that might challenge the official fairytale. Thus, an open defense of people's interests by the people themselves — which is what constitutes democracy — is kept under tight totalitarian control. The state is free: free to manipulate society. And society is paralyzed.

Now, society is not entirely helpless. People use favorable opportunities, chinks in the totalitarian armor, to communicate with each other out of the earshot of the controllers, to find out about their true state of affairs, their true interests, to find out about facts and ideas from abroad. Society tries desperately to reconstitute its autonomy from the fetters of the state. Writers and political thinkers try to communicate their ideas to their fellow citizens, to articulate their true needs, and figure out ways of defending them within the limits of the letter of the law, and beyond it. Society tries to regenerate the true web and texture of social and human relations. People are trying to be in touch with the outside world. They try to rejoin directly, without supervision, the rest of the human family. This is the fight for freedom and democracy in the Soviet area. It is a difficult and uneven fight, a protracted fight, but a steady fight. It is a continuing process.

Let ne now turn to the question, What stake do we have in this struggle for freedom and democracy in the Soviet area, and in its eventual success?

There is, of course, the matter of plain human decency and solidarity, which applies to the people in the Soviet area, as it does to people in Spain, Greece, Uganda, South Africa, or Chile. But in the case of the Soviet area, there is more. We need democracy in the Soviet area because ultimately it is the only reliable and durable guarantee of peace in the world.

Can this be demonstrated? Can it be proven? I think what can be shown beyond reasonable doubt is a coherent pattern revealing an intimate connection between the totalitarian nature of the Soviet regime and its permanent posture of aggressive defense and defensive aggression. What is it the Soviet rulers are trying to defend themselves against? It cannot be their territory. Nobody in the West makes any territorial claims against the Soviet Union. They do not need military power in order to secure economic gains for themselves. The West is ready to offer them on a silver platter whatever they might need in economic assistance, even now. There is no aggressor in sight. Western conventional military forces are pitifully inadequate for any purpose whatsoever. China is relatively too weak.

The only potential danger there is, is aimed at the domestic positions of the despotic rulers in the Soviet Union, and it comes exclusively from within the country. That threat is the innate thirst of men for freedom. That urge has to be neutralized. And it is being neutralized. It is for that purpose that the image of an external enemy is being kept alive, defenses set up, missiles and submarines perfected, armies trained. The climate of encirclement and isolationism is carefully nurtured, so that people are diverted from their true domestic needs. For this, the manipulation of information is essential. This is why a cold war rages inside the country, on the front of communications. This is why intellectuals are being prevented from communicating freely with their countrymen. This is why the same cold war rages with respect to the West, preventing a free flow of informations from abroad. Machines — yes. Books — no. Computers — yes. Newspapers — no. Pipelines — yes. Broadcasts — no.

Unfortunately, in this strategy of blindfoling people, military armaments cannot be used as mere stage props. They have a life and momentum of their own. To be believable, they have to be used in actual staging maneuvres, in preparing positions for possible action, without any obvious rational objectives. This, however, provokes countermeasures on the part of the West and justifies Western military budgets. These, in turn, are used by the Soviet regime as a proof that the image of the external enemy is correct.

This vicious circle, this unending spiral, can be ultimately broken only by the conquest of freedom by the Soviet people. Only that can eliminate the deepest reason of the instability of peace — the totalitarian regime. And that is why we have a vital interest in supporting that slow struggle for freedom and democracy by using imaginatively all means at our disposal.

Letters To The Editor

Right on! UYA

To The Editor:

I am a veteran presently enrolled at UMass as a senior, and I would like to tell you about an experience I had during all of my second year at the University. I took part in the University Year for Action (UYA) program at the University, and, without a doubt it was one of the best-spent years of my life, and definitely the best of my time here. If you're interested in an exciting, meaningful, challenging way in which to spend one year of your time here, please read on.

My freshman year was not exactly what I had expected when I came back to school. Large lecture halls filled with disinterested students frustrated the hell out of me. Even the classes in my major bored me. I couldn't find any real purpose for them once I finished school. They were just requirements to be gotten out of the way.

Then, by a stroke of luck, I heard about the UYA program. UYA is a program whereby student Volunteers go into a community (usually Holyoke or Springfield) and work at any one of a variety of agencies, in any number of fields of interests. A year in UYA gets you 30 credits at the University towards your degree, plus a stipend of approxiamately $2400 from the federal government. An extra benefit for veterans is that you can still collect your full G.I. bill allotment. More important than these practical aspects is that, for once, you can really feel that you're doing something with your life, possibly even affecting some change in the community in which you'll be working.

If you'd like to find out more about a very unique way to fulfill a year's requirements, no matter what your particular field of interest, please give the UYA office a call at 545-1381, or just come to any of the special recruitment meetings listed below. You might discover your whole life changing as a result.

200 mile dribble

To The Editor:

We ask for your support as we attempt to dribble our way from James House to the floor of Madison Square Garden.

This will be a 3½ day journey of over 200 miles. Our sanity has been seriously questioned by those who do not think that we can accomplish this. But when you get up for your 8 o'clock class this morning, we had already been out for 2 hours. In view of this, we ask for your spiritual support along the way.

We would like to thank all of those who helped make this trip possi and we hope to see as many UMies as possible cheering the Minutemen on in the NIT.

Harrington letter sarcastic

To The Editor:

The students supporting George L. Sacco for the position of Attorney General were distressed to see a letter of distortion and naivete written by Edward Harrington, another candidate for the Attorney General job.

Mr. Harrington claims political favortism was shown by Rep. Ralph Sirianni Jr., Chairman of the Committee on Public Safety, at a gun control hearing on February 25th at the State House.

If one looks at the facts, it is obvious that this is not true in the least. Mr. Harrington argues that political biases were shown by Sirianni when he called Sacco to testify before his committee out of order. It is perfectly natural that this occured. Before resigning his seat in the House and his position as Vice Chairman of the House Committee on Ways and Means so as to avoid any conflict of interest in raising his campaign funds, George Sacco had filed a number of bills concerning gun control. As with any citizen who files or co-files a bill, George was notified of the hearing date at which time his bills were to be discussed. Indeed on February 25th, George was testifying before the Public Safety Committee on his bill, H 3388 which in part would provide a mandatory minimum sentence of six months for anyone convicted of illegal possession of a firearm in violation of existing state law.

Furthermore, George was only being accorded the privilege which ALL State Senators and Representatives are accorded in being called out of order to testify. It was no more than a professional courtesy and it is indeed unrealistic to label this "cronyism."

Lastly, Mr. Harrington was free to have testified on Sacco's bill or any of the other pieces of pending legislation concerning gun control. That he was not "invited" to testify is really not at issue as Harrington would have us believe in that the hearings were well advertised in advance and were open to all to attend and to testify at. Harrington had the right to testify before the committee on this vital legislation without being issued an invitation. We are sorry to see that he chose instead to write a sarcastic letter of thanks.

MUA pseudo intellectuals

To The Editor:

Concerning the article, WMUA: OF, BY AND FOR THE STUDENTS (written on March 7; should read WMUA: OF, FOR AND BY THE WHITE MALE STUDENTS.

As expected the Collegian overlooked the black populus involved with the station as they overlook Blacks in the University community.

For such a self acclaimed progressive college station, stagnation seems to be their main theme. There has been no effort in better coverage of Black news or events, unless the Black Mass Communications Project intervenes.

Co-operation is low, and a general concensus of incompetance (on the Black student especially the female) seems to prevail over the "acting" heads.

At present I am engaged with two Black News services to see if a teletype may be purchased and placed on the premises (since thats the only way they will consider blacks in the news other than sports); however I was told that WMUA could not afford it.

I have worked at the station for two years and still find many of the members psuedo-intellectuals and resistant to change. Many wish that I would leave-- but I have a job to do. I am Black, a Woman and a Communicator and must affect change the best way I can. It's not much, but at least it's something.

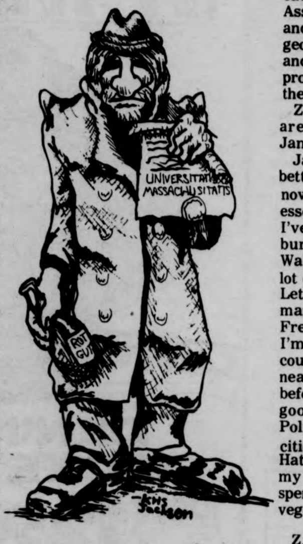
Pre derelict major full

Perhaps no more pathetic sorts running about these days during times of Watergate economies and parachuting streakers are those doomed to graduation in June. They seem to be walking about with grey sunken cheeks and a greenish pallid hue to their benign complexions. Being an observer of the old Eric Sevareid School, I note that these seniors are not like their predecessors, the seniors of the past. They were a bright eyed and healthy lot, filled with endless amounts of nervous energy.They were set to go out and fight a war, or make large amounts of bucks selling insurance or some other Americana, or even to embattle the evil foes of society, such as the Military Industrial Complex, Bess Myerson, Fuller Brush and ole Uncle Tom, depending on what decade they graduated in. Next to these old seniors, especially the latter, the present crew seems a sad bunch. No longer are they eager to take on the oppressive war manipulating power structure or engage the evil spectre of institutional racism or even find solace in the nihilistic nervana of a hippie commune. They seem content to squander in meaningless "meaninglessness" (if you catch the drift), drink Old Bohemian beer, streak about and delight in memories of past glories, fast becoming unattainable again.



I spoke to an old friend of mine recently who is graduating this June. His name is Jamieson P. Lanke and his appearance sort of reminds me of the lost senior of Kris Jackson fame--extremely blitzed.

Z.N.: "How're ya doin there Jamieson?"

J.P.L.: "Fine! Uh....I don't know where I am. Could you help me?"

Z.N.: "Uh, Uh, Sure! You're at UMass Jamieson. YYEEWW MASSS!!"

Lanke: "Oh Ya! I forgot. Now I remember what I was doing. I'm on my way to declare a major. Did you know that everybody had to declare a major before they graduate?"

Z.N.: "Its obscene isn't it. What ever happened to the days of the good ole fashioned Liberal Artist. Well I suppose the market shrunk on that like everything else. What are you declaring?"

Jamieson: "I've decided to be a Pre-Derelict Major with an area of specialization in Reverse Streaking."

Z.N.: "Reverse Streaking?"

Jamieson: "That's where I run fully clothed thru Nudist Colonies waving a yellow flag with a picture of Frank Rizzo on it. Anyways, I've decided to go to Derelict school in the fall, if they take me."

Z.N.: "What d'ya mean IF they take you. You're a sure thing!"

Jamieson: "Waal!! No! There are just too many people wanting to be derelicts these days. And there just aren't enough park benches and empty railroad cars to go around. Why the gutters of New York are so overcrowded with Derelicts that you can't step onto the street from the sidewalk without stepping on one.

Z.N.: "I didn't know that."

Jamieson: "You think that Clinical Psychology, Education and Medical School are tight, but Dereliction is the fastest growing field. More people are vying for each spot than any other. And the Association of American Derelicts and Hoboes is alarmed at the geometrical rise in Pre-Dereilcts and is lobbying hard to turn the profession into a closed shop, like the Bricklayer's Union."

Z.N.: "WOW!! HEAVY!! What are your chances there Jamieson?"

Jamieson: "I think I rate a better than excellent chance. Right now I'm sporting a 1.9 cume-a very essential ingredient that low cume. I've spent the last three summers bumming around at Malibu, Wakiki and Fall River, spending a lot of money and making nothing. Let see, I flunked out my Freshman year getting all F's, but since Freshmen don't get thrown out, I'm still here. Now my F's don't count on my cume which is pretty neat. I took Rhetoric 100 six times before I finally passed it. I've got good recommendations from Police Chiefs of three major U.S. cities and half the bouncers at the Hatch, with whom I've dealt with my meanderings. As long as I spend another useless summer vegetating, I think I'm golden.

Z.N.: "What'll you do if you don't get in?"

Jamieson: "Oh! I'll guess I'll apply to be an elevator operator in the Library, but it really doesn't matter anyway."

Z.N.: "How's that?"

Jamieson: "I'll make it down to the gutters somehow. They can't keep a good Derelict up!!"

OH!! THE PAIN OF IT ALL!!!

Amtrak-phooey

Last week the Washington office of Amtrak was very excited about the possibility of furnishing a special train for UMass students to attend the NIT. Failing that, Amtrak planned to reserve a total of two hundred seats out of 240 per train on selected runs between Springfield and New York at a group rate of $9.50. The latest word is that you can still get to New York by train but at the regular fare of $15.00 per person.

Amtrak for all intents and purposes reneged on their original agreement to give UMass students a reduced rate provided that the Athletic Department could guarantee that at least 200 students would make the trip even though Vic Fusia, the assistant sports information director told them that he would have at least 1000 persons making the trip.

The excuse that Amtrak gave for not being able to block off sections for UMass students was that the Energy Crisis was forcing them to use all their available rolling stock so that they could not provide any preferential treatment to UMass students.

The Collegian feels that Amtrak's excuse is an extremely poor one in that a 20th century corporation should have the intelligence and foresight to plan ahead for such eventualities as the Energy Crisis might bring--in Amtrak's case the need for additional trains.

Furthermore, one wonders what would happen if Amtrak had competition from a private company which might be desirous of our business. There is no doubt that if competition did exist Amtrak would find the trains. But since they're the only company available they couldn't give a damn. There is the position of a state-owned monopoly, unwilling to put out one ounce of effort for a potential market, unafraid if they act in an unethical manner.

The Collegian feels that this incident has proven beyond a doubt that competition in business is an absolute necessity if the consumer is going to have the opportunity to get the best possible deal available, and the freedom to give his business to whatever concern he wishes.

Steve Anderson

Loeb: truthtwister

The Manchester Union Leader, whose publisher recently took exception to a column by the Collegian's Karen Monaco has far greater influence and fame than most papers its size. What is even more remarkable is that this influence effects national politics at least once every four years because of New Hampshire's first in the nation presidential primary.

The Union-Leader is New Hampshire's largest daily mainly because Manchester is the only city in the state that has a large enough advertising base to make the operation of a statewide newspaper possible. In 1964 the Union-Leader had over three times the circulation of its nearest rival the Nashua Telegram. This creates a near monopoly of printed news.

The Union-Leader has some features which distinguish it from most other papers in the New England area. Mr. Loeb is famous for his front page editorials which are often accompanied by photographs. Parts of these articles are accented in bold face type to attract the reader's attention. In the mid-sixties (I do not know if the practice still continues) on the last page news was printed that might appear on the front page on a slow newsday. A regular feature of the last page was the "Over-the-Masthead" series which was an opinion article but not identified as such. The paper's policy editorials reflect Mr. Loeb's opinions. The editorial pages carry few syndicated and local columns along with a daily cartoon. Letters to the editor are extensive and present every side of an issue. National and world news is covered through the news services. This still does not explain why the paper is infamous.

In "Communication is Power" Herbert Brucker accuses the Union-Leader of "blanketing the state with its news reports and opinion articles, it feeds on and reinforces the state's endemic right-wing myopia." As mentioned before Loeb prints a column on the front page every day. These editorials tend to be rather sensational. For instance in 1964 he said "the consequence of the Negro question..will inevitably lead to many more Negroes migrating to the state of New Hampshire. This would cost the jobs of many white people and cause all sorts of disruption and disharmony where there is none at present..people would lose jobs, union members would lose seniority, employers would lose the right to hire people they WANT to hire and should hire and things would be a terrible mess." This has not come true as the black population of the state is a low .2 per cent. Yet it shows the sort of opinion the residents of the Granite State read every day. It becomes even more important when one recognizes that for many people this is the only source of news.

Loeb is known for attacking his political foes for instance Senator Muskie in the 1972 primary. In the 1964 Republican primary he reminded voters of Mr. Rockefeller's divorce with lines such as "so now Rockefeller comes back this time with more deception, deceit and divorce!" and "if the New York Governor had come to New Hampshire this time and had played the game of politics hard by clean and straight, perhaps many people would have been inclined to forget his career as a wife-swapper and those Murphy children whose mother he lured away." (Rockefeller's second wife had left a family that included some small children to marry him.)

More recently on the subject of gay rights William Loeb said of some students at Keene State College who signed a petition favoring the rights of homosexuals "If, after an educational program these individuals continue to support those responsible for moral pollution, then obviously they would not be fit to teach students in the schools of New Hampshire. Nor would the members of the faculty be fit to teach our future teachers. At that point they should be removed from both the faculty and the student body."

One might argue that these opinions can be expressed on the editorial page and in columns; which is of course where they belong. But one cannot overlook the fact that these ideas are not confined to the editorial page which relatively few people read in most papers. They are on the front page in bold type. Even if Loeb were able to completely segregate his editorial opinion from the news articles which I'm not sure any paper can do. There articles would still present a "slightly bias" view of the world.

Loeb once said "this newspaper; of course, as all our readers know, has very strong editorial opinions and we express them accordingly but if we distorted the news as these papers do we couldn't sleep at night."

I would contend that by giving such prominence to the editorials some members of the Union-Leader's staff should have a problem sleeping eight hours a night.

Singers need support

To The Editor:

The University Chamber Singers has been invited by the Council on Inter-Cultural Relations of Vienna, Austria to undertake a European Concert Tour this spring. The invitation was made following a competitive audition which involved colleges aad universities across the country. The group will be singing in some of the finest cathedrals in the world, and in such cities as Vienna, Venice, Florence, and Salzburg.

The Group has been rehearsing diligently to prepare a suitable repertoire which would be representative of the calibre of choral work which comes from this University. Because the ensemble is acting as representatives of the school, we hope that every member of the campus community will show support in this project. Although the members of hte group are working to raise the necessary funds, recent changes in air fare due to the gas shortage have altered the previously projected tour cost. As we are already committed to the tour we urge those who can to help.

In the near future members from the ensemble will be canvassing dormitories and apartment complexes for contributions. Please, don't feel you have to give a great deal, but with the support of everone, even a little goes a long way. Thank you!

Med school wasting

To The Editor:

In recent weeks it has come apparent that a severe budget cut at the University of Massachusetts Medical School at Worcester will drastically limit the number of incoming students for the class of 1974-75, far short of the number of students projected for this year and also far short of what the facilities could handle.

Last week I had a tour of the facilities at the medical school and was astonished by the fact that the buildings were almost devoid of people. Nevertheless, I was impressed by the construction of the buildings which showed a great deal of careful planning had gone into the construction of the school. While there, I was told that the top two floors of the building, although completed, were not in use because of lack of students and staff. The point I am trying to make is that the medical school is finished (power plant and all) and is ready to take on its full complement of students for the upcoming year.

So why the cutback of funds? Not filling the buildings with students is similar to permitting only a thousand people into Schaefer stadium after its completion because of not wanting to spend money for ushers.

This state needs its own medical school for many reasons, one of which is that Massachusetts state university and college students, particularly UMass students, are discriminated against when applying to medical schools, law schools etc. because of the suppoSed inferior education a student obtains from such an institution. There is no foundation for this assumption.

A second important reason is that state residents need a source of quality medical education at a nominal cost. There is no way a person from a middle class background could pay for a medical education at a private university or college without some form of outside help.

A third consideration is the advances in health care available to Worcester and nearby communities if the medical school and its 600 bed hospital are used to their fullest.

You must be wondering by now why the state isn't allowing maximum use of the facilities already established. It seems such a waste to have a fine medical school built for 400 students being used at less than 50 per cent efficiency. The only reason I can venture is that the medical school is again being used as a political football. If the three private medical schools in Massachusetts are influencing this budget cut can not be ascertained. What is certain, however, is that there are many, many people bound to be the losers in this political haggle.

Stop sending the cash!

To The Editor:

In last Monday's Collegian I had written a letter protesting the fact that I paid $5 for a course I decided not to take and then could not get my money back. Needless to say, I heard not from the Everywoman's Center, but to my surprise I did get $5. Yesterday I received a $5 bill folded in a piece of white paper. No note - no name. I figure it wasn't from the Everywoman's Center, for they surely would have let me know who it was from had they sent it. That leaves me with a big fat question mark. Who sent that $5?

To the person(s) who sent me $5: First, I would like to thank you very much. Needless to say I was flabbergasted to receive it. The thought was more than sufficient. But I just can't accept it. I don't want to seem ungrateful, but for me to take that money would be worse than criminal. It still doesn't change the fact that the Everywoman's Center has $5 it should not. It is they who should have sent the money, not someone who sympathizes with me. Can you just imagine what would have happened if everyone who sympathized with me sent me $5? It'd be ridiculous! Please, who are you? I want to give you back your $5 with a great big "Thank you. There should be more people like you in the world!" Please let me know who you are. If you don't want to reveal yourself, at least send me the name of your favorite charity so the money can go to a good cause.

Hooray Ballou

To The Editor:

Hooray for Bill Ballou's commentary, "Streaking and apathy." An added note that supports and exemplifies Mr. Ballous article. Last Wednesday night at the Student Senate meeting in the Hampden Dining Commons Nick Apostola made a motion to recess in order to hear President Nixon's speech and news conference. The Senate did not pass this motion. About an hour later though, it hurriedly passed a motion to recess in order to watch the streakers. Does this tell you where student politics is today???

P.S. I am a member of the Senate and I did note in favor of listening to Nixon...and, as 99 per cent of the Senate members grabbed their coats and ran outside, I will admit that I did too. I still think however that we owed it to ourselves as citizens and representatives in a governing body to have listened to Nixon.

Nixon: never saw other returns

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Nixon said through a spokesman today that he had never seen any previous president's tax returns and does not recall asking aides to obtain such materials.

Press Secretary Ronald L. Ziegler, reporting the President's statement at a news briefing, criticized leaks of information on a congressional committee's study of Nixon's personal finances.

The New York Times said in today's editions that Nixon suggested in June 1969 that members of his staff be given access to the tax returns of former presidents so he could learn what deductions his predecessors had taken.

The Times said it had obtained a copy of a memorandum written by John D. Ehrlichman, then the President's chief demestic counsel, to Edward L. Morgan, then Ehrlichman's deputy, detailing questions that Nixon was said to have had concerning ways he could reduce his tax payments.

Ziegler said he had raised the subject with Nixon today and "he said he had never seen any of the previous presidents' tax returns and does not recall ever asking anyone to obtain such information."

Ziegler said he didn't ask Nixon whether the President was satisfied that none of his aides had seen such tax returns.

In complaining about leaks, Ziegler said his criticism was not aimed at the news media as much as it was at officials who he charged were "misusing their authority."

Volunteer lobbyist avoid disclosure

By DICK BRAUDE
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) — The state's 1973 law aimed at subjecting legislative lobbyists to new public scrutiny has bypassed the largest lobbying faction on Beacon Hill, the League of Women Voters.

The League has about a dozen women who regularly testify at legislative hearings. As individuals who "promote, oppose or influence" legislation, these women are lobbyists under the law.

But they do not have to register in the Public Records Division of the Secretary of State's office because the League lobbyists are not paid. They volunteer their own time.

Under the 1973 law, which is having its first full effect during the present legislative session, paid lobbyists must register in the Public Records Division office. And they must report many of their specific expenditures related to influencing legislation — including meals, gifts, transportation, entertainment, advertising, public relations, printing, mailing and telephone calls.

In addition, employers of lobbyists must also file expenditure reports.

These reports, for both lobbyists and their employers, must be filed on or before May 15 and Nov. 15.

Under the old law, lobbyists did not have to report their expenditures and their employers had only to file one report, 30 days after the end of each legislative session. These reports simply listed the sum of money paid to any one agent.

The League of Women Voters, along with a few small organizations with unpaid lobbyists, are left out of this procedure.

All that is required of the League, and groups with unpaid agents, is to make semi annual reports of their general legislative expenditures, if these exceed $250 in any calendar year.

Officials in the Division of Public Records say this reporting procedure is largely "a matter of conscience" since no one really knows how much organizations with unpaid lobbyists spend on legislative affairs.

John J. McGlynn, supervisor of the division, says the League has been in touch with him about keeping track of its expenditures.

This carton will go back where it came from. Nature.

Is this what they mean by "recycling"?

Measuring the solar wind: undergrads build space test

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — Undergraduate physics and electrical engineering students at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology are putting finishing touches on a complex experiment to be put into orbit next year.

The solar wind experiment built by the students is to be launced in 1975 aboard the Naval Research Laboratory's SOLRAD 11 satellite. The experiment is one of a series of projects intended to measure interplanetary solar winds and their interaction with the earth.

Unlike most projects undertaken by MIT's Center of Space Research, undergraduate students did the major part of the design work.

"It is most unusual to use students, particularly undergraduates, to build something as sophisticated as this," said Dr. Alan J. Lazarus, a senior research scientist in MIT's physics department.

Lazarus and Dr. James K. Roberge, associate professor of electrical engineering, supervised the work on the project.

Many of the students who worked on the experiment used it for master's and bachelor degree theses. The students designed the electronics and tested it from its very preliminary stages on workup boards to the final products.

Lazarus said the final work of electronics constuction and mechanical design was done by professional technicians of the Center for Space Research. He said the project is essentially complete and should be shipped off to the Navy next month.

The Naval Research Laboratory has contributed $300,000 for the experimental package. Calling this a "relatively small amount" for such an experiment, Lazarus says "a number of persons, such as parts suppliers, have been willing to give us a break on prices knowing that students were involved in the project."

New Republic sold

WASHINGTON (AP) — Sale of the 60-year-old weekly journal, The New Republic, to Martin Peretz for $380,000 was announced Tuesday by Gilbert A. Harrison, owner and editor-in-chief.

Peretz, 35, lecturer on social studies at Harvard University, becomes chairman of the editorial board.

Peretz announced that the present staff, including Harrison as editor-in-chief, will continue intact. He said that there are no present plans for altering the format, content or policies of the publication.

The journal, printed in Washington, has a circulation of 100,000. It was founded in 1914 by Willard and Dorothy Whitney Straight as an American weekly journal of opinion, concentrating on public affairs, books and arts. Harrison bought it 20 years ago.

Conn. rail service

WETHERSFIELD, Conn. (AP) - Cutting railway freight service in Connecticut would affect even communities not directly on the abandoned rail lines, residents complained to a federal hearing yesterday.

Fairfield County, gateway for much of the state's incoming rail freight, would feel the greatest impact, according to planners from the southwestern part of the state.

The Connecticut Turnpike already is filled to capacity between Greenwich and New Haven but would have to carry more vehicles if trains abandoned some of their freight to trucks, a spokesman for the Darien Environmental Action group said during an Interstate Commerce Commission ICC hearing.

In addition, abandonment of existing track probably would eliminate the chance of reviving rail passenger service to meet future mass transit needs, said a planner with Environmental Study and Protection Inc. of Newtown.

Several dozen witnesses spoke during the second day of an ICC hearing on a nationwide freight reduction proposal. The plan, drawn up by the U.S. secretary of transportation, seeks to ease the financial lead on struggling railroads.

The trucking industry may not be able to provide the heavy units to move bulky or large shipments now hauled on railways marked for abandonment, said a transportation specialist.

Industry reports indicate that enough big trucks are not available, either in Connecticut or elsewhere, to carry freight now moving on lines that may be closed, Adrian H. G. Forestier, a governmental transportation consultant, testified.

He added that it was as "unreasonable" to consider segments of the nationwide railfreight network for elimination as it would be to cut off the small but lifegiving capillary blood vessels in the body.

The 175 miles of Connecticut railroad labled "excess" in the proposal include meet of the Norwalk-North Canaan line through Danbury, the New Haven-Suffield line through Plainville and much of eastern Connecticut's freight service.

Gradual reduction of railway freight into southern Connecticut by the Penn Central and its predecessor, the New Haven, had caused a sharp increase in truck traffic on the Connecticut Turnpike, said Stephen Nightingale of the Darien group.

Vt. death penalty

MONTPELIER, Vt. (AP) - The Vermont Senate gave initial approval to provision for the death penalty in specific cases of murder within the criminal statutes.

Voting 18-12, the senators approved the death penalty for conviction on a charge of aggravated murder when a judge has found "beyond a reasonable doubt that, in view of the nature and circumstances of the offense and the history and character of the offender, the protection of the public requires that the death penalty be imposed."

In addition to that finding, the death penalty could be imposed only if the offender's conviction "was based on the direct testimony of at least one eye witness" or if evidence against the offender "included his confession to the murder."

The vote on the death penalty was the first in what was expected to be a long series of votes on a complicated rewrite of the state's criminal statutes.

Supporters said requirements that a psychiatric evaluation be made and studies by a judge and that a judge determine whether the death penalty should be imposed probably would bring the punishment in line last year's U.S. Supreme Court decision on capital punishment.

Bookstore larceny

BOSTON (AP) - Former Boston State College bookstore treasurer Edward J. O'Donahue of Newton has been given a 2½-year suspended sentence and two years probation after pleading guilty to larceny of bookstore funds.

Suffolk Superior Court Judge John T. Moriarty suspended the sentence and placed O'Donahue on probation on condition that he make restitution of $10,000 within three months.

A Suffolk County grand jury indicted O'Donahue on charges of taking a total of $44,500 from the bookstore between July and October 1966.

Alleged accomplice

SPRINGFIELD (AP) - Kenneth Walters, 17, of Springfield, has pleaded innocent to two counts of being an accessory after the fact to murder in the January slaying of Karl D. Lee, 81, the retired Enfield, Conn., superintendent of schools.

Walters was arraigned Monday in Hampden Country Superior Court here on grand jury indictments handed down last week.

Four other persons have been named in murder indictments in the slaying.

Lee was found beaten to death Jan. 27 in Blunt Park.

Boston area holdups

QUINCY (AP) - Quincy and Boston police were continuing their search yesterday for six armed robbers who held up bank offices in apparently unrelated incidents Monday.

Three men wearing ski masks fled from the Norfolk County Trust Co. branch in Quincy with $5,000. Later in the day, three other men escaped with $21,000 from a downtown Boston State Street Bank and Trust Co. office. Guard William Clark, 55, of Salem, N.H., was treated and released from Massachusetts General Hospital for head injuries sustained in a struggle with one robber at the Boston bank.

In Quincy, one bandit fired a shot into the ceiling of the bank office, disarmed a security guard and forced him outside, where he was released unharmed.

STCC at Westover

CHICOPEE (AP) - The president of Springfield Technical Community College will meet Friday with members of the Westover task force to discuss a proposal for a college branch using Westover Air Force Base facilities declared excess by the Defense Department.

Dr. Edmund Garvey's proposal was made public at a legislative education committee hearing in Boston Monday by Rep. Francis C. Lapointe, D-Chicopee.

Lapointe said Garvey has recommended a branch that would specialize in occupational training.

Perry school closing

MILTON (AP) -The Perry School will close July 1, 1974, after 76 years of continuous operation, and its early childhood teacher training program will be absorbed by Curry College, school officials announced yesterday.

"The boards of trustees of Curry and Perry have agreed that it is in the interest of both schools to integrate the Perry program of early childhood education into the Curry College division of education and behavioral sciences next fall," said Frederick G. Perry of The Perry School.

"From a financial standpoint, it is an absolute necessity. Educationally, the Perry program will be continued and broadened within the framework of a specialized major."

Federal judgeship rumored for Meskill

HARTFORD (AP) - Gov. Thomas J. Meskill is "under active consideration" for a federal judgeship, an aide to U.S. Sen. Lowell Weicker Jr., R-Conn., said yesterday.

The aide, Richard McGowan, said an announcement may be made later in the week.

Meskill, who announced Monday he would not seek re-election, is "definitely under consideration" for a vacancy on the U.S. Second Circuit Court of Appeals, McGowan said in a telephone interview from Washington.

Under a gentlemen's agreement, Weicker will recommend someone for the job to President Nixon who nominates the judge. Senate confirmation is required.

Earlier in the day Meskill said he would serve out his term as governor through this year.

At his morning news conference, Meskill held open the possibility of taking the judgeship or even running for elective office again.

"The next announcement should come from Weicker," Meskill said. "The last word I heard was that he was going to talk to me about it."

He said that although he would be considered a "lame duck" he planned to be a vigorous governor in the remaining nine months of his first term.

"I just decided I did not want to be governor for four more years," Meskill said. He cited family obligations and rejected any Watergate influence in his decision.

He said he wouldn't try to regain the 6th District Congressional seat he held for four years prior to becoming governor.

Meskill often said he wanted to spend more time with his wife and five children. He added that at times as governor he became bored between crises.

"I had to decide what I thought was best for my family," Meskill said.

"Being governor was never anything I had set my sights on. When the opportunity presented itself four years ago...it appeared, quite honestly, that if I didn't run the Republican party was going to nominate a very good man but a man whom I felt would not win. It was at that time that I decided to make the run," he said.

If Meskill hadn't been the candidate in 1970 the GOP nomination probably would have gone to former state Sen. Wallace Barnes of Farmington.

"I suppose you could say since the day I was inaugurated the possibility existed that I wouldn't run again," Meskill said.

He said neither Watergate nor pre-election polls that consistently showed him finishing second to Democratic Congresswoman Ella T. Grasso influenced his decision.

Meskill said he thought GOP candidates in Connecticut could win this year if they don't let themselves by "psyched out" by Watergate.

He said he hoped to plan an active part in the campaign but had no choice yet who the nominee should be.

Meskill yesterday nominated Republican Party counsel Francis J. McCarthy of Wethersfield for a seat on the Connecticut Superior Court bench.

McCarthy was nominated last year by Weicker to fill a vacancy on the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. Weicker later withdrew his name when it appeared the American Bar Association wouldn't approve him.

McCarthy was named by Meskill to succeed Milton H. Meyers of Waterbury who will reach the maximum age for judges, 76, later this year.

Mt. Washington ordeal ends for 2 brothers

MT. WASHINGTON, N.H. (AP) - Two brothers were rescued safely and reported in excellent condition yesterday after spending three days in sub-zero temperatures and hurricane force winds near the summit of Mt. Washington.

A state conservation officer found John Kelley, 26, of Marblehead, Mass., and Joseph Kelley, 41, of New York, N.Y. in a lean-to shelter about one-half mile from the summit of the 6,288-foot high mountain.

The men began the climb Saturday and as they reached the summit the weather changed drastically. They told rescuers they made their way to a shelter and spent the night there. Winds reached 100 miles per hour on the summit and the temperature dropped to -16, officials said.

On Sunday they were able to reach another shelter but were forced to stop by 60 m.p.h. winds and sub-zero temperatures

Fireman dies in Wakefield

WAKEFIELD (AP) - The body of a Wakefield firefighter was found yesterday at the site of a general alarm blaze that destroyed two clothing stores and a pharmacy.

Lt. Robert Sullivan, 37, fell thrugh a floor that collapsed in the fire, which began late Monday night. Firefighters searched for Sullivan's body for about four hours after the blaze was put out.

Damage was estimated at $125,000. The cause of the fire was not determined, and the state fire marshal's office was called to investigate.

Saying nay to the naysayers

(following is the text of university president robert wood's speech given at the umass harbor campus in boston, february 25, 1974)

The opening of the Harbor Campus is an appropriate time to take stock, to identify choices that lie ahead for this vital part of the University. The Chancellor ably began that process on February 14; I am glad to continue the course of conscious analysis and deliberate consideration of our priorities. For this University is a continuing, expanding enterprise. Its growth is not concluded; its programs are not fixed; its future is not pre-determined; its role of leadership is still intact. All of us, and all who observe us, should understand that we mean to continue, to progress, and to lead.

We are asked now to prove the worth of higher education, to justify with increasing specificity our call on public resources, to demonstrate the personal and public gains that accrue from a broadly based, easily accessible public institution of higher learning.

a complex of forces, of course, have combined to bring about this shift in national mood; the backlash from campus turbulence of recent past; a sense that the expansion of enrollments throughout the 1960s somehow rectified the studied neglect of public colleges and universities, especially here in massachusetts; the darkening economic scene; the frustration at the halting process of disengagement from indochina; the disenchantment with institutions of all kinds; the acknowledgement that limits of growth were applying everywhere.

But the mood is especially intense in education, in no small measure because of that perplexing, ironical impulse of the academic community to self-destruct. Philosophically, the impulse expresses itself in commentary and analysis skeptical of the human capacity change and grow, and of the effectiveness of the role of formal education in the process—one might characterize this commentary as galloping Jencksism.

At rock bottom, the new conservatism advances an explanation of poverty strikingly similar to the assumptions of the Elizabethan Poor Laws, and correlates once again material failure with moral indulgence. So far as education is concerned breeding counts; so does family background. Scholars are born and not made; in the pursuit of understanding and knowledge, you have it or you don't.

And in the specific area of higher education, the academic disposition to retreat before joining battle seems unlimited. The shining example: five years in the making, six years in production, the report of the Carnegie Commission on Higher Education, soberly concluding that research in "the great research universities is essential," education in small, private colleges is "particularly to be preserved," and public universities should raise tuitions and place a moratorium on expansion.

Three fundamental errors flaw the Carnegie Commission work:

—First, an inappropriate economic analogy that treats our undertaking as a factory, and undertakes to judge us by industrial standards of productivity and profits...

—Second, a persistent bias, evident from the composition of the Commission, through its separate reports, to its final themes, toward the private and restrictive...

—Third, as many have observed, the Commission is empty of educational content. No substantive themes as to the shape and direction of education, like those that characterized the Harvard and Columbia reports after the Second World War, have appeared in the Carnegie reports...

i do not believe the anti-intellectual, anti-education mood will prevail. i do not think, especially in massachusetts, that we will be content to educate only the very rich and the very poor. i believe that we can demonstrate that sons and daughters of "ordinary" people--and "ordinary people" themselves--can enrich their own lives and society as well by easy access to higher education. i do not believe the naysayers among us are right.

I do suggest, however, that their presence means we are in new times, with new chances, that call for new ways of carrying out our traditional commitments.

For the University, let me suggest new chances critical to our progress and leadership, and let me describe the nature of the options: in governance, in growth, in public-private relations, and in the conscious planning of our future...

governance: We are half into our first year of University life according to the plan--largely devised by the Faculty and adopted by the Trustees--known as the Wellman Report. The 70-day time clock on primary initiative recommendations is ticking on a number of items now, and a body of common procedures is building from the process of consultation between Chancellors and governing bodies. The two multi-campus committees established to advise me in budget and planning are at work, with Professor Richard Lyons of this campus leading the planning committee and Professor Richard Louttit of Amherst chairing the budget committee.

I look forward to their advice and counsel as I discharge my principal responsibilities to make final recommendations to the Trustees as to the master plan of the University and its budget. In the discharge of the President's other principal responsibility--the award of tenure subject to Board concurrence--I hope that the process of long-term departmental planning will provide a context for individual decisions that assures timely and vital renewal. In close association with department heads and deans, and working through the Chancellors, I believe we can make major progress this year.

Communications: How to know what is going on, who has priorities in what parts of the University. Here I hope the Office of University Liaison Services under Robert McCartney can be a great service in handling both formal and informal exchanges. With a perspective and judgement gained from his many years of service to the University, Mr. McCartney stands ready to help in any way he can to achieve our mutual goal of "no surprises."

Closure Problems: Establishing clearly in everyone's mind when a matter has been decided. This year, for example, there was some misunderstanding at Amherst as to when the policy guidelines on faculty merit awards were finally fixed. There are other issues across the University, such as revising enrollment goals, in which debate goes on based on assumptions no longer in effect.

Validation Problems: Who speaks for the University, where and when. The quick answer is that a formal vote of the Trustees is the most official, authentic way we establish a position--but that is too quick an answer and clearly much greater codification of procedures and policies is in order--as your Chancellor continues gently to remind me.

Finally, Calendar Problems: Let me give this issue a moment of special emphasis.

We march at the University to several different drummers: the academic calendar of classes and semesters; the Trustee calendar of 10 meetings each year, prescribed by law; the Board of Higher Education and Secretary of Educational Affairs review calendar. Faced with this array, the process of deliberation and debate has some tangible constraints. Since few matters are self-contained on any campus, deadlines result rom outside requirements. Enrollments, admissions, budgets, courses of study are some examples. The graduate review at Amherst cannot postpone indefinitely graduate decisions for Boston. Budgets cannot be made without reference to academic problems. Periodically, things must happen.

I have no pat resolution to this problem--no single calendar. I simply ask your understanding that sometimes if recommendations are not forthcoming in areas of primary initiative, actions may have to be taken in any event. We will always try to avoid such situations, but we will need the close cooperation of every governance body to do so.

growth: calendars suggest time, and time suggests the second new change: how we should grow. it is clear that the "automatic growth" period has passed for us here and nationally. the challenge is not how to accomodate greater waves of 18-year-olds from academically superior high schools. it is whether or not we can provide opportunities to those who 10 years ago would not have contemplated higher education and now do.

Assurance of diversity and tolerance of pluralism form the keystone to any strategy for orderly development. I hope we never see at this University an academic department so divided and torn as the History Department at CUNY appears to be. Let us learn to respond to both the lessons of Brown University and the plea for professional help from the outside that appeared simultaneously in yesterday's papers.

Public-Private Relations: Inseparable from the issue of future development is our relationship with our colleagues in the private sector. The University is no longer treated with indifference by its private counterparts, as it once was--least of all this campus. And in the nearly four years I have been with the University, more and more outside observers appear eager for outright confrontation between the two sectors, a pitched battle, zero-sum game.

Finally, Planning Our Future: Every topic I have touched on so far...carries with it an explicit requirement that the University charts its course with greater care and by more conscious planning. Although our budgets have increased from $60 million to $90 million in the past three years--and I hope they will increase again--we can no longer proceed on the simple forecast that the tide will always rise and all boats will therefore float. The more explicit statement of goals, the more measured allocation and reallocation of resources, the deliberate establishment of priorities, are now prerequisites.

The governance process must ultimately develop and choose among alternative plans and priorities, but it must do so on the basis of comprehensive analysis and from an empirical base. The multi-campus planning committee will carry a heavy responsibility in this respect, but I hope to involve the talents and interests of many in the process of study and deliberation that has to precede the posing of options.

One planning matter that is clearly urgent is the character and future of graduate studies, especially here in Boston. Of all the new chances these times provide us, this opportunity to develop new graduate programs for students of all ages, cutting across disciplines, problem-oriented, and exceptional in design and purposes is perhaps the greatest. To do so requires an understanding as to the evolution of graduate programs in Amherst and Worcester as well as of specific proposals from Boston.

but for all the new chances, one of our opportunities is ancient and constant: to do better the established functions of the university; to excel in research, in teaching, and in service.

to excel is to lead, and the central objective of a university within a state system of public education is to be the leading institution in the largest possible number of ways.

We are probably clearest as to what constitutes excellence in research: originality, reliability, parsimony. Now, on this campus, the means are more and more readily available to satisfy professional curiosities.

Teaching is also an accepted responsibility, and one this campus has accepted with enthusiasm. But we always need to ensure that we acknowledge the responsibility the University assumes when it admits a willing student. It must respond with interest, concern, and the resources necessary to the task. And, more and more, we need to develop ways of selecting our students on the basis of promise and aptitude, and not prior achievement. We are scarcely a generation away from the time when even our most distinguished universities admitted almost every applicant with little attention to their past academic performance. We may have been spoiled by the selection of students made possible in the admission pressures born of the sixties.

The public service role remains, in my judgement, the most selective. We can and should help in the world of "practical affairs," but only where we have something to offer. But I hope, as I have said elsewhere, that the capabilities of our faculties can be carefully matched to issues involved in the pursuit of peace, the resolution of domestic conflict, and the improvement of the quality of urban life--rather than a commitment to national security matters and space exploration that commanded the attention of too much of the academic community in the past.

my colleagues, if we can lead in these areas at a time when resources are harder to come by and simple growth no longer is an answer, then we can indeed refute the naysayers among us. again, we can make plain to public leader and citizen alike the value and the necessity of a great public university. if we do that, it will be a good year.

Video materials

A group of university affiliated individuals is presently striving to collect a wide variety of non-professionally produced video and TV related materials suitable for distribution to the Holyoke Cable Community. This group is trying to establish a regular ongoing TV show which will spark the interest of cable subscribers in Holyoke and South Hadley. The ultimate aim is to involve the members of these communities in designing and producing their own TV programs by demonstrating the capacities (and limitations!?) of TV production for the non-professional.

Presently the group is striving to catalouge a library of potential material for distribution. All the members of the Five College Community and the Pioneer Valley at large are urgently invited to contact the group for tte submission of material.

The information needed at present is: The name of the production, a paragraph describing the production, statement concerning technical quality (picture stability, alot of roll etc.), where the tape is presently located, name of the owner or person to contact.

If any students would like their productions broadcast over Holyoke Cable, please call 253-7056 or 549-6013.

AHORA

AHORA, la organizacion estudiantil universitaria, ha estado trabajando en muchos niveles para aumentar la participacion de los hispanos en todos los aspectos de la vida universitaria. Tambien ha estado activamente envuelta en el reclutamiento y la participacion de la comunidad hispana no estudiantil en los ofrecimientos culturales y educacionales en UMass.

Por cuestiones de vital importancia para ca comunidad hispanoparlante, anunciamos una reunion de emergencia que se llevara a cabo hoy a las 5 de la tarde en el Campus Center, salon 805-809. Es de suma importancia que todos los hispanos asistan puesto que la agenda tratara de asuntos que nos afectan a todos nosotros. La agenda tratara sobre el componente hispano y su futuro, ayuda financiera y los planes para el reclutamienta de estudiantes para septiembre. Sera 5 a 7. de la tarde.

Film society

The 'UMass Super 8 Film Society', still in the developmental stage, is seeking new members. Students with an interest in film are urged to come to the Thurs. night meeting any week in the Campus Center (check room no.). Questions and suggestions are invited.

At a previous meeting, the purposes and guidelines of the club were formed. Suggestions considered were the formation of a film stock co-op, an information resource center (with literature on film making as well as up to date film festival information), and a talent pool.

Another big goal of the film society is the creation of a good super 8 film and sound editing facility. At the present time, UMass has only equipment for 16mm film, which is available only to students in film courses.

Other possible features of the club may be informal screenings of student and other films with discussions of film technique, sponsorship of lectures and super 8 demonstrations, and sponsorship of film festivals of student made films on campus.

Find out what the Super 8 Film Society is about-it may be what many students have been looking for.

Senate budgets

The Student Senate budget committee will submit its budget proposal for the '74-'75 academic year tonight in the Campus Center. Among the proposals included in the budget is a decision to withdraw financial support from the International Programs.

The reasons behind this decision are three-fold. The major reason being that the entire budget itself is being reduced. This overall cut in the budget has caused a priority list to be drawn up. International Programs received a low standing.

The budget committee feels that International Programs is primarily an academic concern and thus should be the domain of the academic administrations as regards financial support. They also think that it is not a service to a majority of students.

"This move if passed will seriously jeopardize the extent to which the International Program can function in this University," said Roland Goodbody, a member and supporter of the program.

Job project

Students interested in the Vocational Project have until March 22 to begin their career exploration.

The goals of the Project are to explore occupational interests, suggest vocational alternatives, and do vocational exploration. The project is sponsored by the Student Development Center.

Any interested student can start the project by going to Room 213 of Berkshire House, and contacting the receptionist, weekdays 9-5. The staff has assisted many students thus far, and will make every attempt to accomodate as many interested students in the next two weeks as possible.

CC blues project

The James Montgomery Band will be appearing at the Campus Center this Thursday following a successful national tour. The six-man band led by vocalist and harp player James Montgomery intersperses a few rock numbers in their hard-driving blues program. The show will be opened by Knightly, an imaginative rock group, which is on its way up.

This will be the first appearance of the James Montgomery Band at UMass since playing to sellout crowds in the winter and spring of '73. Tickets will be available on the Campus Center Concourse for $2.00 in advance and at the door for $2.50 the night of the show.

Outing auction

An auction sponsored by the UMass Outing Club will be held on Monday, March 18, in the Campus Center, Room 162.

Nick Desouza, the Outing Club's vice-president of equipment, said the O.C. will auction some of its used tents, lanterns, sleeping bags, downhill skis, and other equipment. Anyone with camping, skiing, or mountaineering gear for sale or swap is invited to join in.

The Outing Club hopes to bug new equipment with the money that is made to provide for its growing membership. The club has 475 members this school year, an increase of 275 members from last year.

Robeson series features Evans, Brooks in SBA

Tomorrow at SBA 120 at 8 p.m., two highly acclaimed Black poetesses, Mari Evans and Gwendolyn Brooks, will take part in the Paul Robeson Lecture Series which will be sponsored by the Southwest Assembly and the Southwest Black Causus.

After the lecture, a reception will be held in the Malcolm X Center for Third World students.

In continuation of the series, a poet workshop will be held at the Southwest dinning hall, Hampden Commons at 2 Thursday afternoon.

Cigarette tax eyed

A bill which would tax cigarettes according to tar and nicotine content has been heard by the Legislature's Joint Committee on Taxation.

Rep. John A. Businger of Brookline filed the bill which was studied and evaluated by Asst. Prof. Ethan Katsh and several students of the UMass Legal Studies Program.

The bill would add four cents tax to each package of cigarettes high in both tar and nicotine. Speaking before the Joint Committee last week, Prof. Katsh said the tax would be "an important public health measure and a dependable source of revenue." A similar tax in New York City brought in $22.6 million in revenue the first year, and resulted in the reduction of tar and nicotine content in about 12 per cent of all cigarettes sold in the city, he say.

Smoking, he says, is a "public" health problem, and the tar and nicotine tax is a "realistic means of reducing the harm associated with smoking...Since cigarette smoking is habitual in nature, the most--and perhaps only--effective public health strategy to discourage cigarette smoking short of outright prohibition is to encourage switching to lower tar and nicotine levels."

State issues housing bonds

BOSTON (AP) - The Massachusetts Housing Finance Agency said it issued $40,740,000 in housing project bonds to convert construction loans to 40-year mortgage loans.

The agency said the mortgage loans are for 19 completed housing developents containing 2,046 dwelling units in Boston, Cambridge, Framingham, Haverhill, Holyoke, Lawrence, Leominster, Milton, New Bedford, Springfield, Taunton and Weymouth.

The agency said that at least 25 per cent of the apartments in each development are made available to low-income persons for a rent based on 25 per cent of income.

William J. White, executive director of the agency, said Tuesday the bonds were sold at a net interest cost of 5.943 per cent. They are dated April 1.

Collegian a big one

By BRENT WILKES
MDC Advertising Manager

The Collegian, the Umies very own newspaper, is one of the largest college dailies in the country. With 18,000 copies printed, the National College Newspaper Directory contains only fifteen college dailies which are larger than the MDC. The list of over 1,000 college newspapers is headed by the Michigan State News and the Ohio State Lantern with circulations of about 40,000 each.

The actual size of the paper also ranks it with the top college dailies. While many papers average eight to twelve pages per day, a report by Alvin Oickle, Publications Advisor at UMass., reveals that the Collegian averaged about twenty-four pages a day last semester.

There are several reasons for this apparent success. The setting in which the Collegian operates encourages an enterprising paper. As Bill Densmore, Managing Editor, explains, "The five college area is full of exciting things which allow a lot of opportunities for the paper."

He went on to say that the Collegian is also not in direct competition with any other paper in the area. Outside of the Springfield Union, it is the only morning daily in western Massachusetts. Thus the students and faculty rely on it as a primary source of information and communication within the university community and outside it as well.

Densmore said a hardworking and highly committed staff strives to meet these needs of the readership.

The Collegian sucess is also attributed to a strong advertising department which is capable of raising most of the revenue which is needed to sustain a large college daily.

Art exhibits shown in Coolidge library

By STEVE TETREALT
MDC Staff

You say there are art exhibits where? In a Southwest Tower?

Sure enough, Coolidge Tower has been presenting art exhibits in its 12th floor library.

The latest exhibit, which closed over the weekend, was entitled "Afro-Expression", and featured 35 works contributed by UMass Third World Students under the direction of Nelson Stevens a University professor.

According to Joe Battista, Coolidge Tower Coordinator, the next exhibit will feature arts and crafts work done by Coolidge Residents. "This includes any works that residents would like to contribute---macrame, paintings, sculpture, sketches, photos. Informally, we've been trying to organize this since last semester, and the project has been taking definite shape since intercession." The exhibit will be held the first full week in April, with that particular Thursday night being set aside for a sale of the various arts and crafts projects doneby the students.

Battista hopes that a project such as this can be continued. The first such exhibit was held last year and featured works by women. Many students became interested in adding atmosphere to Coolidge, and thus this year's program in being organized by a student committee coordinated by Gail Davis, Residence Director of Coolidge Upper.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Special tip to men about the Virgo woman: If you want to impress her, dress neatly and take her to a lecture, especially on a first date. And don't forget to polish your shoes! This woman, at her best, is loyal, frank, thorough, discriminating and has a wry sense of humor.

ARIES (March 21-April 19): ReinForce, build for security, double-check procedures. Older individual can aid by lending benefit of experience. Be smart enough to accept. Money, budget and hidden costs are spotlighted. Reject the superficial. Dig for additional information.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Accent is on public relations, special efforts connected with legal rights. You are given green light. Now you can experiment. Key is to be patient, to know what it is you want and to avoid scattering your efforts.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Stick to facts. Be thorough. Pace yourself. Show that you are capable of handling important assignments. Be frank. Deliver what is promised. Get to heart of matters. One in position to make your life more beautiful is making a decision.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Creativity is highlighted. You are better able to express feelings, especially to younger persons and to member of opposite sex. Gemini, Virgo persons could figure in important ways. Be ready for change, variety and communication with those in transit.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Obtain valid hint from Gemini message. Check costs, sales, values and inventory. You may not be getting deserved tax break. Know it and review entertainment, public relations expenditures. Family member makes reasonable demand. Comply.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Relatives may be victims of wishful thinking. Be aware, alert and go after "hard news." Means reject the superficial. Pisces, Virgo persons are likely to be in picture. Short trip may be high on agenda.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You are repaid for past efforts. Prestige rises, and with it you have added responsibility. You deal with those in positions of authority. Positive gains are indicated. But you work for what you get--and you earn plaudits. Profit picture is bright.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Stress universal appeal. Means reach more persons through better distribution. Aries, Libra persons figure prominently. Cycle is such that you are at right place at proper time. You intuition is sharply honed--follow through on hunch.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): What was hidden may now be revealed. You gain greater insight. Creative juices flow. You teach and learn. You become more aware, more capable of putting plans to work. Ideas become viable concepts. Be sure, definite and confident.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Friends, social activities dominate. Leave details for another time. Grasp overall concept. Hold fast to principles. Verify beliefs. Member of opposite sex pays meaningful compliment. Your morale is boosted. You will be more secure within.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): One who previously was insistent, stubborn and refused concessions begins to support your position. Maintain balance. Don't jump to conclusions. There are motives. Be flexible enough to work within boundaries. You will understand.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Discuss plans for future. Open additional lines of communication. Correspond with one who is at a distance. Refuse to be painted into corner. You have right to expand horizons. Aquarius, Leo, Scorpio individuals are involved.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you have more strength than many persons are likely to suspect--or detect. You are your own secret weapon. You know how to marshal resources and use them. July will be one of your most important months of 1974. You revere truth and have a poetic way of expressing it. Many born under Leo are drawn to you.

Wren to visit area in effort to upgrade veterans' discharges

Ms. Irene Wren of the National Council Of Churches will spend three days this week in Western Mass talking with veterans and people concerned with veterans affairs about the possibility of upgrading "other than honorable" military discharges. Ms. Wren, who is working on a national program for Special Ministries-Vietnam Generation, is particularly interested in training people to counsel veterans regarding their right to appeal their discharge status. She claims that some 450,000 Vietnam-era veterans nationwide suffer discrimination in employment, housing, medical care and educational benefits because of other than honorable discharges. Many of these rights, she says, could be recovered with proper legal counsel.

Today and tomorrow, Ms. Wren will be in the Amherst-Northampton area working out of the Veterans Affairs office at Umass. She will meet with local college veterans affairs officials on Tuesday at 1 p.m. in Room 239 of the Whitmore Administration Building, andwith local town Veterans Agents at 7 p.m. in Room 174 of the Campus Center.

Tomorrow, Ms. Wren will meet with lawyers and legal studies people in the afternoon, and in the evening a public meeting has been scheduled at the Amherst Unitarian Church from 7-10 p.m. for all veterans interested in the possibility of upgrading their discharges, as well as families and friends of such vets.

On Friday, Ms. Wren will be in Springfield all day working out of the Council of Churches building on Sumner Ave. Anyone interested in discussing military discharge problems should schedule an appointment through the Rev. Ronald Whitney at the Council offices.

It was to laugh

A colloquium on "Preliminary Notes on Laughter" was held in the Thompson Hall faculty lounge Monday. The talk was given by Ms. Gail Jefferson who was here to seek a faculty position in the sociology department.

Ms. Jefferson said the study on laughter was based on a ten year collection of audio and audio-visual recordings. These tapes are of conversations in which laughter occurred. They were analyzed to find the structure of laughter in conversation.

The major point of the colloquium was that laughter has a patterned structure. It is organized much like taking turns and question-answer sequencing when we talk.

Ms. Jefferson has a PH.D. from the University of California at Ervine. She is a west coast ethnomethodologist of the new breed. More recently, she has been on a post doctoral fellowship with Erving Goffman at the University of Pennsylvania.

Early spring activity makes Johnson very happy manager

By DAVE O'HARA
AP Sports Writer

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — After four exhibition games of the regular schedule and another of informal variety because of the caliber of opposition, Manager Darrell Johnson is all smiles, waiting patiently for further developments on the Boston Red Sox.

"Many things are looking awfully good, but if you tried to start crossing out names right now, it would be very tough," Johnson said Monday after the Red Sox' 9-5 victory over the Houston Astros at Cocoa.

"We have an awful lot of good looking young players and you just can't tell at this point," he said. "Sure, you can name players certain to make the team, but at this stage I'm not counting any others definitely out.

Johnson, who won a promotion to Boston by managing Pawtucket, R.I., of the International League to the Little World Series Championship last fall, is happy as his problems appear to widen. He loves to watch the fight for jobs.

A case in point is veteran utility man John Kennedy, who earned the tag "Super Sub," as a standout in 1971-72 before slipping at the age of 32 last year.

Kennedy made his exhibition season debut against the Astros, at shortstop of all places. There is a three-way battle between Luis Aparicio, Mario Guerrero and Rookie Burleson at short, and, besides, Kennedy figures to be better at filling in at second or third.

Kennedy is a special invitee to training camp. He accepted a demotion to Pawtucket last fall to make room for a younger player on Boston's 40-man spring roster. However, he's playing like a rookie, working as hard as anyone in camp.

Against Houston, popular "J.K." had a key single in a two-run fifth inning and then drilled a homer over the left field fence in the seventh as the Red Sox went on to score six runs and nail down their third triumph in four regularly scheduled games in Florida. He also made a couple of fine plays in the field.

Red Sox' Manager Darrel Johnson

Asked if Kennedy really had a shot at making the Red Sox and what it would take, Johnson said candidly:

"J.K. has a tough fight. Mostly because of the kids we have. However I'm not eliminating him. Things depend more on what others do down here than what he does. We know what he can do. It's up to the others more to prove what they can do."

Johnson was impressed by three rookie pitchers against Houston, although Mark Bomback, of Fall River, Mass., gave up eight hits, Chuck Ross three and Bill Kouns one. Bomback and Ross worked four innings each, and Kouns the ninth.

"I felt they all threw well," the manager said. "Bomback, who has one of the better chances of making the team, had some poor support both in the infield and the outfield. Ross is only 21, but doesn't look it. He's definitely a starting pitcher of the future. Kouns also looked good in his one inning, and he did well for the two more we played strictly for a workout."

UCLA opens NCAA's no. 2 in AP poll

NC State top team

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

UCLA will open its bid for an eighth straight NCAA championship Thursday night as the nation's second-ranked basketball team.

And the Bruins' opponent will be No. 20 Dayton, the team that helped UCLA become runnerup to North Carolina State in the latest Associated Press major college poll released today.

Dayton became No. 20, replacing Oral Roberts in the poll, by upsetting Notre Dame 97-82 and dropping the Fighting Irish to third place.

North Carolina State, which won the Atlantic Coast Conference Championship with a 103-100 overtime victory over Maryland last Saturday, remained No. 1 with 24 first-place votes and 792 points. The Wolf-pack will take a 25-1 record, best of the 20 ranked teams, in the NCAA East playoffs against No. 5 Providence, 23-3.

UCLA, 23-3 after winning the Pacific-8 with a lopsided victory over No. 15 Southern California, received the other 17 first-place votes and 748 points. Dayton, 20-7, cracked the rankings with 23 points.

Notre Dame received 652 points. The Irish will play in the NCAA Mideast against No. 12 Michigan, which won the Big Ten title in a playoff against 10th-ranked Indiana Monday night. Only games through last Saturday counted in the poll.

Maryland finished its season with a 23-5 mark and fourth place in the rankings, with two polls yets to be held. Maryland turned down a bid from the National Invitation Tournament.

Alabama heads the Second Ten, followed by Michigan, Pittsburgh, Kansas, Southern Cal, Louisville, New Mexico, South Carolina, Creighton and Dayton.

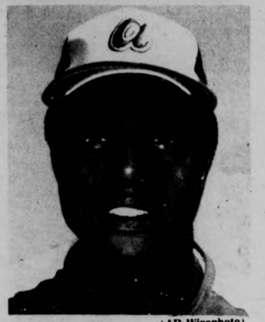
Players react to Aaron case after Commissioner's order

By WILL GRIMSLEY
AP Special Correspondent

"If they want Hank Aaron to hit those home runs for the fans, why don't they let him go back to Milwaukee and do it?"

That was the laconic reaction of the New York Mets' Bud Harrelson Tuesday to baseball's sizzling controversy: Do the Atlanta Braves have the right to hold Aaron out of the three-game opening series in Cincinnati and wait for the return to Atlanta for the two home runs that will break Babe Ruth's career record of 714?



(AP Wirephoto)

Aaron will hit no. 714....

The issue has been rekindled by a virtual directive on the part of Baseball Commissioner Bowie Kuhn issued Monday that Aaron should play in the Cincinnati games if he's able.

The commissioner's action raised questions of baseball rights and sharply divided not only the game's players, managers and officials but also the fans.

Harrelson, the Mets' peppery shortstop, represented one strong viewpoint of the players.

"I don't think Aaron owes the Atlanta fans a damn thing," Harrelson said. "He owes it to baseball. After all, most of Hank's career was spent in Milwaukee, and Atlanta fans haven't done much to support him."

In Cocoa, Fla., Preston Gomez, manager of the Houston Astros, said he though Kuhn's action might set a bad precedent. "I believe it's a decision of the manager and the club. I think the commissioner is wrong to put pressure on them."

Most of the managers contacted preferred not to get into the squabble, following the pattern of Ralph Houk of the Detroit Tigers. "I have too many problems of my own," said Houk in Lakeland, Fla. "Let sleeping dogs lie."

Red Schoendienst, whose St. Louis Cardinals played the Chicago White Sox in Sarasota, Fla, agreed in part, but added: "If I had the same problem, I would consult my general manager but I think I would play him. He hits a lot of home runs in Cincinnati."

"I'm glad it's not my headache," said Yogi Berra, manager of the Mets, in St. Petersburg, Fla. "The main consideration is winning the game. That's more important than the home runs. He's going to break the record, anyhow."

The question is, when?

Billy Martin, boss of the Texas Rangers, said in Pompano Beach, "The commissioner has set down the guideline. Right or wrong, you have to go along. I've been in the Army twice. You've got to learn to take orders."

Eddie Robinson, vice president of the Braves, said he was surprised and called Kuhn's action "ticklish." There were hints that Bill Bartholomay, Atlanta's chief executive might resist the commissioner's pressure.

Many observers felt that the Braves created their own monster by announcing plans to hold Aaron out of the Cincinnati series.

"If they had kept their mouth shut, there wouldn't have been all this fuss," said the Mets' Willie Mays, whose 660 home runs ranks third, behind Ruth and Aaron.

(AP Wirephoto)

No matter what Kuhn says.

Boston's veteran Orlando Cepeda was asked in St. Petersburg what he thought about it, "I know nothing-I don't read papers," he replied with a shrug.

He left the impression that baseball might survive despite it all.

The DH and College

"The DH rule is here for this year anyway. I like it and we'll certainly give it a fair try in college ball this spring" Coach Dick Bergquist

For the spring of 1974 intercollegiate baseball is going to experiment with the Designated Hitter rule adopted by the American League two years ago.

And the majority of the coaches tend to feel that it will be a welcome change for the game. Archie Allen, Springfield College baseball coach for a number of years, said, "it is an attempt by us (the coaches) to bring back a semblance of offense to the game. And look it...we'll never know unless we try it once, right?"

The rule reads as follows: "Rule 7, Sec. 11; A player may be designated to bat for the starting pitcher and all subsequent pitcher(s) in any game. A designated batter for the pitcher may bat in any position in the line-up but must be selected prior to the game and must be included in the line-up cards presented to the umpire-in-chief."

Upon agreement of both team's coaches prior to the start of the game, it may be also played so that an optional substitution rule may be in effect. This will enable a coach to pull a certain player from the line-up and reinsert him later in the game. The coaches' feelings towards this rule in the Northeast, however, are not favorable as too many coaches feel is it not written properly and could be too easily exploited. Such matters will come forth for discussion at the national meetings at the conclusion of the season.

The DH rule will enable college pitchers not to have to worry about the hassles of batting practice and let them concentrate solely on their pitching techniques. But is this good for the pitcher who is an all-around baseball player?

Last year the Minutemen had two of the best hitting pitchers in the East in Mike Flanagan and Tom White. Both were big and strong and were capable of hitting a home run at any time.

In fact, it was Flanagan who set a national record for hitting three consecutive home runs in three consecutive times at the plate while pitching a game. At the time he was suffering from the flu but he managed to limit Northeastern to just two hits while striking out twelve. With pitchers like this would Bergquist want to use the DH rule?

"First of all let me say that we don't have them this year...the pros do. And last year we had Pete Collins who could have been great for us this year with the DH, but he left school. There would have been times when I could have made great use of it last year but we didn't have it. Now we do and I'm short of firepower at the plate - at least compared to last year."

Ron Beaurivage, who last year hit with good authority, could well be the best shot at a DH spot right now but somebody has to beat him out for first base before he is relegated to the DH spot.

"I like the DH rule and I think it will give more of our guys more playing time," said Captain Beaurivage. "We're gonna have the firepower. Just give us that week down South to prove it."

Steve Newell, former All-American outfielder for the Minutemen and now with the Montreal Expos' farm system feels that it could help college baseball in the long run as it will tend to make for less monotonous pitchers' duels.

So, will the DH rule adoption make for better college games this spring? Most coaches think so but they want to wait to see it in action first. By June, we'll all know.

Intramural odds and ends

Boyden Sports Complex: It's quiet! The regular season of intramural basketball is over. Now, the top teams in each of the thirty-six men's leagues, and eight women's leagues enter the Campus Playoffs for the 1973-74 Championship. So the chances of you getting a court at night will be like walking into the Bluewall after your 2:30 class for a beer, easy.

With the exception of last night's game between the J.B.'s and the Issibssa, the playoffs go full tilt starting tonight at 5:15.

See, UMass gets the jump on the major leagues: While the NBA and NHL teams are still battling for a playoff position, our own champ will have been decided next Wednesday night in the Complex at 7 p.m.

All it takes for the remaining teams to become the new champ, is to win their next five games, and they've got the title.

The refs for these big games really have to be good at controlling the game, especially with so much at stake. There'll be a lot of "C'mon, ref", "What do ya mean, three seconds?"-a lot of complaints, but the IM refs can take it. The fouls will be there-the physical play under the boards too. In fact, the only thing that will be missing, is the idea that it's all for fun. But that's o.k. (as long as you win, right?).

To those teams that didn't make it-there's always next year. Or, you could try your luck at another sport. Maybe it was the computer-arrainged league you were put in that made your team look so bad. Or was it because you were out for a good time, while the other team was out to kill? Everything's alright, anyways. Just keep practiciing at the Elementary School's six-foot baskets, and hope next year, Boyden lowers their nets.

DOWN COURT: The Hot Shots should be a favorite to defend the title -they won last year, but don't bet on it. Some of the other teams that look good are the Trees from Crabtree (catchy, huh!), the Grasshoppers from JFK, the Moore Bullets, and the Thatcher Redwoods. I'm not usually right when it comes to predictions, so the real teams that pose a threat are probably the ones I didn't mention....in women's basketball, go with the McNamara Manglers (from the Elite section of campus) or the Koalas.

Bring on Jacksonville

By EARLE BARROLL

Steve Mayfield was a sophomore at Bethlehem High (N.Y.) when a carnival of seven-footers and a coach festooned in powder white jackets and floral pants threatened the collegiate basketball establishment from a base of operation called Jacksonville University.

There was Artis Gilmore, Pembrook Burrows III; remember Rex Morgan and don't forget that little bugger Chip Dublin whom Mayfield recalls as "that nut who came off the bench." Their coach was colorful Joe Williams, who scoured junior colleges, offered athletes the world, made sure they got just that and left for Furman when the NCAA said enough was enough.

"And to just think," said Mayfield, "I saw them play against UCLA in the finals of the NCAA on TV and now just a few years later we're playing Jacksonville in the N.I.T." Of course the cast has changed, but the reputation not, as this will be the Dolphins' fifth consecutive trip to a post season tournament.

"They'll be a great challenge for our team," said Jack Leaman. "They have an excellent national reputation and anytime we have the opportunity to get on the same court with a team of this stature it means an awful lot to UMass. We're anxious to play them and we feel we have a right to play them."

Jacksonville has always had a gimmick. First there were the seven-footers Gilmore and Burrows, followed by another, David Brent. And this trio appears on page eight of this years' basketball brochure as "The Home of the Seven-Footers."

What concerns UMass presently is the latest publicity piece: "The Super Six". Six high-school all-Americans who as freshman at Jacksonville averaged 115 points per game and now form the nucleus of this years' 18-7 team that last year with the same group blew an 18-point lead and lost to Austin Peay and "Fly" Williams in the semi-finals of the Mideast regionals.

With them have come the usual Jacksonville jokes: One basketball is not enough; their 5'2 guard can reverse dunk; they get 115 points one night, give 115 the next and if you mention defense they say "huh"?. But, in the ultimate, when a team goes to tournament after tournament and makes 20 wins a habit there is something special to say about them.

"I've heard some awesome things about them," said Leaman. "They're very big, extremely good shooters and on certain nights they're capable of playing excellent defense and blowing anybody around out of the house." Such as Houston and N.I.T.-bound Cincinnati in their final two games.

"Coach told me the guy I'll be guarding is 6'6 and 235 pounds," said Peter Trow. That guy is Henry Williams who along with center Butch Taylor (6'10) and guard Leon Benbow (6'5) are Jacksonville's three potential pros. If you fill in the other two starters the front line reads, 6'6, 6'10, 6'8 with a back-court of 6'5 and 6'3.

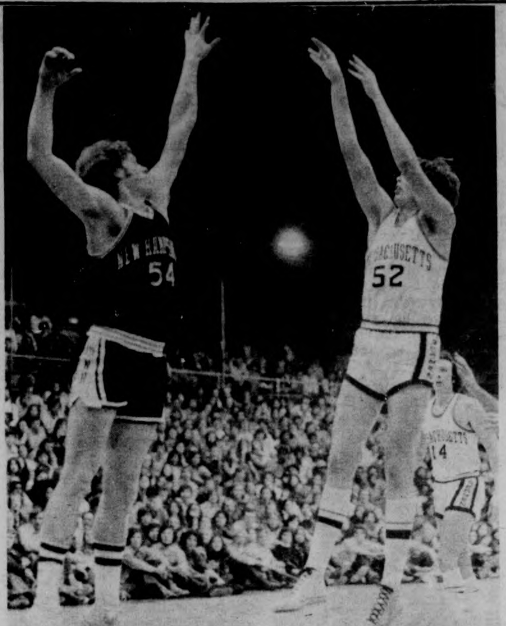
"We're obviously going to be at a tremendous height disadvantage," said Leaman. "But we'll work on blocking them out and getting back quickly on defense to counter their potential fast break." On the other hand the Dolphins themselves will have their hands full maintaining non-playground habits in the face of UMass' patented machine.

"We're not going to change a style that has won 21 games for us," demanded Leaman. "They'll find us very tough on defense, much quicker than most teams they've played and I think we can raise a lot of havoc for them on defense with our patented and patient offense."

Leaman had just returned from New York where he went through his yearly N.I.T. luncheon, press conference and usual amount of "do you want to leave UMass for such and such a school?" There was likewise the appearance of Jacksonville's coach Bob Gottlieb whose spiel left Leaman with this final observation:

"This will be the first time since I've been going to the N.I.T. that both teams and coaches expect to be playing basketball Tuesday night in New York."

..Peter Trow will be doing his dribbling against 6'6" Henry Williams when the Minutemen open the NIT, Saturday night.



(Staff Photo-Dan Smith)

..Artis Gilmore is in the pros, but John Murphy will have to get inside position on 6'10" center Butch Taylor when the Dolphins of Jacksonville face the Minutemen on the Garden floor.

Springfield seeded first in Eastern Regionals

By JOHN BOCK
MDC Sports Writer

UMass has the defending National Champion Women's Gymnastics team right? Last year they cleaned the house on everybody they met, right? They won the Easterns last year, right? Well, one out of three isn't bad especially when the spoilers to two of those questions comes from down the road in the form of perennial gymnastics power Springfield College. The Chiefs have been spoiling more men's athletic contests than the Irish out of South Bend, so it isn't surprising that their women take after them.

Last season UMass' only two losses came at the hands of Springfield College as they lost to SC by 1.5 points in the dual and closed that gap to .15 in the Easterns, but lost just the same.

Springfield College looks just as strong this year having upset the Minutewomen at SC by a 107.25 to 105.30 score. Overall the Springfield Women's team sports a very respectable 104.62 average while UMass is a not-too-distant second with 100.02. After that the teams kind of dwindle and pale by comparison as the scores bottom out around the mid sixties.

This is how the teams will stack up for this weekend's Eastern Association for Intercollegiate Athletics for Women (EAIAW) Championship that will take place in Curry Hicks Cage Friday and Saturday. The top seed went to Springfield with UMass second and Southern Connecticut third. Towson State of Maryland, Penn State, Slippery Rock and Clarion State, all of Pennsylvania, Trenton State of New Jersey, West Chester State of Pennsylvania, and Boston State round out the top ten seeds. Other teams from Montclair State, Nassau Community College, Yale and Temple just to name a few will be competing in the twenty-one team field.

Katherine Kolemainen of Springfield College was outstanding in the All-Around along with teammates Debbie Dunkley and Debbie Mezger. Terri DeNardi from Southern Connecticut was supposed to be one of the top women but is out for the season due to a dislocated knee incurred during the UMass - Southern Conn. meet.

UMass NEUWA champs off to Iowa St

By JOHN BOCK

The University of Massachusetts will attempt to prove that New England wrestling is on its way up as they send their four NEUWA Champs out to Iowa State University for the NCAA University Championship March 14-16, 1974.

All winners of the New England University wrestling Association Tourney join thirty-four other wrestlers in a weight class from various conferences and tournaments as qualifiers for the big prize — the distinction of being the best collegiate wrestler in the United States.

UMass will have Larry Reynolds at 118 pounds, Russell Chateauneuf at 134, Steve Benson at 158, and Dennis Fenton at Heavyweight as the standard bearers of the Minutemen. To say they will have a tough time would be a slight understatement.

Seven out of last year's ten national champs will journey to Big Eight Country and Iowa State's brand new Hilton Coliseum (seating 14,500) to defend their titles.

For the Minutemen, all will find themselves knee deep in talent at their weight classes. Larry Reynolds will have top seeded Gary Breece from Oklahoma University in his weight class along with, Big Ten swifty Jim Brown of Michigan. From back East Slippery Rock's Jack Spates and Pitt's George Bryant could give Larry problems.

Russell Chateauneuf has Jim Abbott of Wisconsin and with-in conference neighbor Billy Davids of Michigan in his class besides Rohn.

Captain Steve Benson has in Coach Barr's words "...probably the best chance of anyone from New England to place. Steve has reached a peak now where he could wrestle for any team in the East including Penn State. I am going to try hard to get in a seed."

Dennis Fenton may have the toughest going at Heavyweight because everyone is out to win this year as super-heavyweight Chris Taylor is in the pro ranks. Top seed should go to undefeated Larry Avery of Michigan State while Gary Ernst of Michigan and Dave Graves of Washington will be up there. Fenton's outstanding strength will be well tested.

Bruins, Celts win

Sabres dropped 4-0

BOSTON (AP) - Bobby Orr topped the 100-point mark for a record fifth straight year and Gilles Gilbert earned his fifth shutout of the season as the Boston Bruins upended the Buffalo Sabres 4-0 Tuesday night at the Garden.

John Bucyk with his 27th, Wayne Cashman with his 23rd, Phil Esposito with his 59th, and Richie Leduc with his 3rd scored for the Bruins who reduced their magic number to 14 points over Montreal in their first place quest.

Shamrocks 110-93

PROVIDENCE (AP) - John Havlicek, Don Chaney and Paul Westphal combined for 71 points Tuesday night in leading the Boston Celtics to a 110-93 National Basketball Association victory over the Portland Trailblazers.

Havlicek scored 27, Chaney added 23 and Westphal chipped in with 21 as the Celtics won their 11th straight game over Portland in the last three years. The game was a "home" contest at the Providence Civic Center.

Bill Ballou

WHA-downhill

Newspaper columns lately have been filled with reports of the improving health of the World Hockey Association. WHA fan(s) might be wise if they take them in the same light as the relatives of a friend dying of cancer take the optimistic reports the doctor gives the patient.

Things from that league don't look too bright, no matter what the PR men say.

Take a look at last year's showcase franchise, New England. Technically they haven't moved, but the Eastern States Coliseum in West Springfield is a long way from Boston Garden.

Hartford is the eventual Whaler destination, but still, when a team that was your best one year is forced to move the next, you've got problems.

How about New York? Two sets of owners have come and gone from a city whose support is supposed to be crucial in the establishment of any major sporting league.

The Titans-Jets, the Nets, the Islanders have all made it in New York while the Golden Raiders-Blades now operate out of Cherry Hill, N.J. Cherry Hill is not big time.

The Minnesota Fighting Saints may have to evoke their namesakes to stay in operation; they haven't made a rent payment in months.

The LA Sharks are talking about moving; several teams already have. Vancouver, a transfer from Philadelphia, has sold most of their seats in the form of season tickets, but are having trouble with "no shows." It's not because of TV, either.

Franchise problems are, naturally, their major consideration. Take a look at their franchise locations: Springfield, Cherry Hill, Edmonton, Indianapolis (future), Cleveland. It reads like a list of America's ten least wanted cities. You can't make Filet Mignon out of ground beef.

Neither can you make good hockey teams out of lousy players, and it's that they will eventually kill the WHA.

Who's the league's leading scorer? (Hint: he plays on the same team with his sons) 46-year-old Gordie Howe, undoubtedly a great hockey player, but kind of old to be leading a 'major'' league in scoring.

How about their leading goalie? If his name escapes you, don't feel bad. It's Don McLeod, a good goalie, but unfortunately he has a club foot.

Their agents claim the best player in hockey is Jim Harrison, ex of Edmonton, but the claim may change now that Harrison is headed back to the National League. In fact, a lot of people may be headed back. A few have jumped already, and even a few minor leaguers, and the message from them is that most of the NHLers that jumped are going to make their money and then head home.

If you're a WHA fan you are a.) rare; b.) desperate to see any kind of hockey and c.) near extinction. Get your tickets early for those Whaler playoffs in Springfield.

The building only seats 5600.

Senate votes for death penalty

WASHINGTON (AP) - The Senate voted yesterday to restore the death penalty for espionage, treason and certain other federal crimes such as kidnaping and airplane hijacking that result in death.

The vote was 54 to 33.

The bill, modified somewhat by amendments, now goes to the House, where no early action on it is in prospect.

Urged by President Nixon a year ago, the bill is designed to overcome a 1972 Supreme Court decision that the death penalty, as applied under existing laws, was unconstitutional.

The bill lists a number of aggravating factors which would make the death penalty mandatory.

However, if any mitigating factors existed, such as being under 18 years of age or having significantly impaired mental capacity, a death sentence would be barred.

Other mitigating factors set out in the bill are acting under unusual or substantial duress, being a relatively minor participant in a crime, and not having been reasonably able to foresee that one's conduct would cause a risk of death to another.

The presence or absence of aggravating or mitigating factors would be determined in a separate court proceeding, before a jury or a judge, after a trial at which a defendant had been convicted of a capital offense or entered a guilty plea.

This procedure is intended to meet the objections of Supreme Court justices that the death penalty has been imposed too arbitrarily to be constitutional.

The aggravating circumstances set out in the bill depend on whether national security crimes or murder are involved.

In murder cases, they include killing "an especially heinous, cruel or depraved manner," killing for hire, or killing in connection with an airplane hijacking, kidnaping, escape from custody and certain other crimes.

In national security cases, they include a defendant's prior conviction for a similar offense and knowingly creating a grave risk of substantial danger to the national security.

Before acting, the Senate killed an amendment requiring the registration of all handguns, banning domestic production of cheap handguns and the licensing of their owners.

The amendment, offered by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass, was tabled and thus killed by a 68-21 vote on the motion of Sen. John L. McClellan, D-Ark., floor manager of the bill to restore capital punishment under federal law.

Apathy plagues Senate

By MIKE HENAULT

By 11:15 someone called for a quorum and Student Speaker David Booker found that there weren't enough members to continue.

The crucial business at hand was the final approval of a 'system of priority categories.'

During the over four hour session senate leaders attempted to push through final approval of a plan for setting the groundwork for all organizational spending in fiscal year 1975.

The categories would have placed all RSO services and clubs within a high or low consideration group. The lengthy debates saw the placing and replacing of clubs vying for a position on the totem pole of importance. The final listing could be roughly translated to mean that Categories I, II and III would receive most of their requested funding. Categories VII through IX will get their budgets cut drastically and Categories IV to VI will be reduced somewhat.

As the night went on senators increasingly dribbled out of the session till there was actually no majority present. Finally in a parlimentary move designed to preserve the position of the International Organization in Category IV, Senator Jack Margossian called for a quorum.

This forced the Senate to adjourn. Final passage of the priority system, in some form, is expected next week.

In another move the Senate scheduled elections for April 3-4. The election is for nineteen Senate seats already vacant since this month's election.

Quinn won't join Common Cause monitoring project

By JOAN FASSNACHT
MDC Staff

Massachusetts Common Cause Director Judy Epstein said yesterday that Attorney General Robert H. Quinn's refusal to join Common Cause's campaign monitoring project is, "a quirk of his nature. It's too bad he doesn't want to work through us."

Quinn could not be reached yesterday by the Collegian for a statement. Instead, his press office issued a statement made by Quinn at a meeting of the Massachusetts Broadcasters' Association on March 5; concerning his disclosure of campaign funds:

"There has been some misunderstanding concerning my position on the reporting of campaign finances. Let me take this opportunity to sketch briefly what I have done and what I will do regarding full disclosure of campaign funding information.

"The new campaign finances reform act provide for full reporting of all campaign receipts and expenditures. My committee-Friends to Promote Attorney General Robert H. Quinn-has filed all information with the Secretary of State's office, the repository named in the reform law. In addition, although not required in the act, all contributions to the committee made prior to the law's January 1 effective date have also been filed.

"It is also not required that the occupation and principal place of employment of contributors of $100 or more be reported. But I will ask my committee to make this information a part of my public report.

"As for my decision not to join the campaign monitoring project of Common Cause of Massachusetts-under the new law, all campaign funding records will be open records-available to any citizen and to all civic groups. I believe that this information must be available to all groups not just one particular organization.

"May I reiterate, firmly, what I have said time and again--the public shall have all information, not only that information to which it is legally entitled, but everything it is entitled to under those moral and ethical standards that I insist should be adhered to by any person in public office."

Ms. Epstein said that while Massachusetts has very good campaign finance reform laws, Common Cause's Campaign monitoring project would like to see two additional points added to the law. They are:

1. the occupation and principal place of employment of contributors over $100 be reported.

2. contributions to campaigns prior to January 1,1974 be reported.

In his above statement to the Mass. Broadcasters' Association on March 5, Quinn indicated that he would voluntarily comply with Common Cause's two suggestions, although he refused to join their project.

In reply to Quinn's statement, Mr. Epstein said, "That's fine with us. We're more concerned with getting the information to the public. We'll get copies of his financial report from the Secretary of State's office and disseminate it to the public."

Quinn made his original statement of refusal to participate in a campaign monitoring project sponsored by Common Cause last week. During a University of Massachusetts video taped program two weeks ago, he said he planned to make his personal finances public, but said he did not see its relevance to his being a "good governor."

Bus driver assaulted

By MIKE KNEELAND
MDC News Editor

A UMass bus driver was struck over the eye with a soda bottle last night by a passenger who claimed he had been passed by earlier.

Don Peloquin, a senior, was taken to the UMass infirmary where he received four stiches above the left eye and was released.

Peloquin said he was returning from Sunderland and was stopped at Squire Village when a man boarded the bus. He accused Peloquin of purposely passing him by at Latroba's when the bus was going to Sunderland. Peloquin said he didn't remember seeing him at the stop.

Witnesses said the man began swinging what appeared to be a full bottle of ginger ale and struck Peloquin above the left eye. The passengers attempted to subdue the assailant and forced him off the bus.

A passenger, himself a bus driver, drove the bus to the Campus Center where he discharged the remaining six passengers. He then drove Peloquin to the infirmary.

Campus police said they had no immediate comment, but that two officers were investigating the incident.

Fighting doublespeak

By LAWRENCE KORNFIELD
MDC Staff

George Orwell's prediction that Newspeak will convince people "war is peace" by 1984 may be exagerated, but "public lying" is being used increasingly by government officials to distort reality. So says Walker Gibson, a professor in the UMass English Department.

Prof. Gibson is founder of a division of the National Council of Teachers of English devoted to combating Doublespeak. Doublespeak is the misuse of words to cover up reality.

Some examples of Doublespeak are the use of "low-income" to mean poverty in government documents and "air support" to mean bombing raids.

Government officials are not the only ones responsible. Doublespeak is being used more and more by everyone including members of the academic community says Prof. Gibson. Madison Avenue is a particularly heavy offender.

Last year 40 English teachers conducted a "Washington Tour," visiting the public relations men for such federal agencies as the FCC, FTC, and the Department of Defense. They came back in a state of "exuberant outrage," says Gibson.

The leader of the tour, Terence Morgan, said "We found ourselves unable to penetrate the bullshit barrier." Another tour member added, "Why, after all that's happened recently, should an intelligent person believe anything that comes from the government?"

Gibson says the function of the committee is to "make people more alert, so they can deal with the lies being hurled at them." He feels there is "small hope of change in Washington," and they can only "improve the public's defense" by educating them about Doublespeak and how to deal with it.

The committee's greatest efforts have been in getting the present educational system to educate people on Doublespeak. Training in how to deal with Doublespeak would be most appropriate in Rhetoric Courses like the ones at UMass, Gibson said.

The academic community has not responded very favorably so far, but he sees the greatest hope in the sincerity of the younger generation.

Neuroscience developments may hold promise for blind

Important developments in the study of the brain and nervous system promise dramatic breakthroughs in the treatment of blind persons, claims Dr. William Dobelle, a leader in this field of neuroscience.

"Artificial Vision for the Blind by Electrical Stimulation of the Brain" will be the topic of a speech by Dr. Dobelle, director of the neuroprosthesis program at the University of Utah's College of Medicine. The lecture, open to the public without charge, will be given at 4:30 p.m. Thursday, March 14 in Lecture Room Two of Merrill Center, Amherst College. This lecture had been postponed earlier.

Dobelle and his co-workers are now at work designing a miniaturized system that may produce useful vision, but such a development is still years away. The system would consist of a subminiaturized camera placed into the eye socket set within a glass eye. The camera would transmit light sensations to a tiny computer built into an eyeglass frame. The computer would translate the light into electronic currents and send these impulses back into the brain.

Such a device, Dobelle emphasized in a recent Newsweek magazine feature story, would not reproduce normal vision. But it would permit a blind person to perceive objects, including faces, and allow him to read. The successful development of such an artificial system of vision would revolutionize the treatment and prospects of the estimated 350,000 legally blind persons in the United States.

Frats working for Muscular Dystrophy

By WILLIAM F. O'BRIEN

The Shamrocks against Muscular Dystrophy will be conducting an intensive door-to-door campaign Thursday to raise money for the National Muscular Dystrophy Association. They will also be soliciting money in the Campus Center and Student Union.

This program is being sponsored by the SPE fraternity, in conjunction with the XU and KAT soroities. This has been an annual event sponsored by SPE for the past five years with the exception of last year, when another UMass frat held a dance marathon to raise money.

Dan Walsh of SPE, the chairman of "Shamrocks against Muscular Dystrophy" said the response of people volunteering has been excellent, and the only thing needed now is for people to open up their pockets. He has set a personal goal of $5,000 This could be met easily he said if the people in the dorms contributed $.25 each.

He said it's unfortunate so many people associate the Greek community with parties and drinking. It's noteworthy that most Greek organizations are often involved in programs of this sort. Such an example is having this fund raising during St. Patrick's Day, a day usually associated with partying and drinking. Hopefully, Walsh said people will realize the Greek community is not just "a big party."

Nudies on the cruise

By GAIL BERGER

It seems "Vacations in the Buff" may be the answer for habitual streakers.

Travel agencies say they are now booking nudist tours to Hawaii, West Indies, Virgin Islands, and various resorts in Europe.

The Campus Travel Center says these tours are hard to advertise in here because of the Valley's fairly conservative population.

The trip costs no more than any other tour offering similar programs. Chartered "nude schooner cruises are even available for groups interested in volume buying.

"One thing is for certain," one UMass student speculated, "you won't have to spend too much on clothing."

Library has water problem

By ALAN ANASTOS
MDC Staff

For the fourth time in three weeks, there is a plumbing problem at the library. The problem, affects only the top half of the building and is related to water pressure.

Normal town water pressure is able to carry water to the fourteenth floor, but a pumping system supplies the other fourteen floors. That vital piece of machinery is broken, however, and its one year guarantee has expired.

Leon Liberman, project engineer for the library, said, "In such a complex system one of a million things could be wrong. It is impossible to diagnose the situation and attend to it immediately." He added that "this is not so serious a problem."

He said the pump can be started by pressing a re-set button. Though this does not solve the problem, it does indicate "this isn't anything serious, because if it were, the pump would knock-out again as soon as it were re-set," he said. Apparently, once the pump is reset it operates for several days before breaking down again.

Bill Schumann, also of the physical plant, isn't certain just what the problem is, but thinks it may be electrical. He says he is giving the situation his "undivided attention" and is confident the problem will be rectified soon.

Problem pregnancies hassle UMass

By CAROL SCHIEB

Prevention of pregnancies among women is a much discussed issue today and problems it involves also exist at UMass. With all of the information and contraceptives uses constantly being researched and exposed to our society, one might wonder what the problem is?

Pregnancies on campus do exist. No definite statistics however can be obtained for there are many cases that never become known

Problem pregnancy counselor and part time employee in the contraceptive clinic Ms. Fraser said that "the main reason is probably the failure of women or couples to make a decision about their own sexuality and to admit they are sexually active". Before taking contraceptive precautions this decision must be made.

She said there is a "failure to realize how easily it is to become pregnant. I continuously hear the phrase 'I never thought it would happen to me'. Pregnancies often occur after someone has been sexually active for the first time."

Very rarely does Fraser work with women who have become pregnant through rape. The few cases she has encountered were handled by the use of a Morning After Pill. She said, though, there are more instances when a woman has been raped by what she calls "technical but not literal rape; if a woman has known the person for a long time."

"When two people are engaged to be married they are usually already sexually active", she said. Therefore engagements are not a great contributing factor in sexually active relationships.

For those who become pregnant and do not want to go through with the pregnancy, abortions are readily available. An early procedure abortion costs $125.00 and is covered by the Student Health Insurance policy, explained Fraser.

Dealing with a pregnancy is a hard decision for women, Fraser says. It is usually a crisis and they have problems facing it. Fraser stressed she handles "Problem Pregnancy counseling, not Abortion counseling." She said the decision a woman makes after becoming pregnant is up to the woman. Some alternatives are marriage, adoption, single parenthood, or abortion."

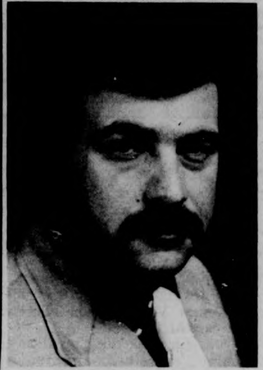
"More women are deciding to keep their child, or at least have their child these days," said Fraser. After the birth of a child some women "try to stay in school; some marry or live together and then make an agreement where one works and the other stays in school; or both drop out of school," she said.

The infirmary offers contraceptive clinics four evenings a week from 5:15 p.m. to 9:15 p.m. and on Thursday afternoons. The procedure involves going to the educational session first to get information on all methods of contraceptives so a decision can be made by individuals on the method they want. They can also obtain knowledge of other methods to use temporarily if something isn't readily available.

Fraser is temporarily located in 319 Hampshire House but will soon be moved to the Infirmary. She said appointments are booked solid, and emphasized that an appointment must be made with the Infirmary before attending the clinic.

Campus Center names Amico food director

The appointment of Philip V. Amico as director of the Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center Food Service Department here has been announced by John W. Corker, director of the center.



Mr. Amico comes to the University from the University of Hartford, where he was director of University Food Services. His experience on the University of Hartford campus included contract feeding in the residence dining halls and the various food service departments in the Student Union building.

He has extensive institutional food service and commercial restaurant experience. A graduate of Boston University, he has held various positions with Ogden Foods, Inc., ARA Services, Inc., and Associated Restaurant Consultants, Inc.

As the director of the Campus Center Food Services, Mr. Amico will be responsible for policies, budgets, and the overall operation of the various food and beverage departments.

Mr. Amico is married and the father of two children, ages four and two.

Environment studies: an option for all

By DONNA HARTMAN

The Institute for Man and His Environment has much to offer undergraduates, graduates, faculty members and the public, but many people are not aware of the department and its functions. Craig Zimmring, a first year graduate student in environmental psychology and a counselor for the Advisory Office of the Institute, explained that the Institute is in its second full year of operation, but it actually began to formulate in 1971, after the first Earth Day.

Members of the department come from diverse fields and have a wide variety of occupations relating to man and the environment. The research done with respect to the Institute can incorporate any undergraduate student interested in the environment. According to Mr. Zimmring, if one is a BDIC student, has a specific major related to environment studies, is devoting his life to environmental studies, or just has a passing interest in the environment, he will be welcome to study with the Institute.

The center aids students in specific ways by maintaining a list of environmental courses, establishing environmental majors for undergrads. maintaining a list of faculty interests and faculty research, offering career counseling, offering modest grants for support of undergraduate research, and maintaining contacts with environmental programs outside of the university. The Institute also communicates with working professionals who can find opportunities for students who really want to work with the environment.

The Institute has also established a Center for Environmental Policy Studies that works closely with state agencies on environmental problems and is funded by the Executive Office of Environmental Affairs. Its four main areas of emphasis are: "the review of selected environmental impact reports for the Environmental Affairs Office in Boston; the development of intensive short courses for government personnel employment by the Department of Natural Resources, the Metropolitan District Commission and the Department of Agriculture in conjunction with the Executive Office of Environmental Affairs; the development of studies relating to long-term environmental policy alternatives for Massachusetts; and functioning as a continuing link between UMass and facets of state government having responsibility relating to environmental matters."

On Saturday, April 20, an undergraduate conference: "Environmental and Behavior in the Northeast" will convene at Hampshire College. Twelve papers are to be presented by students from as far away as Wisconsin. Films and workshops will also highlight the program.

Black children not understood

Black children would get more out of school if their white teachers better understood black speech, according to research by two UMass communication studies professors.

Prof. E. Harris Nober and Asst. Prof. Harry N. Seymour studied the comprehension levels of 50 black and white UMass undergraduate student-teachers to the speech of 48 black and white Springfield first-graders. They concluded that white teachers not accustomed to the speech of black children should be trained to understand it.

"...the neophyte white student-teacher who enters the low-income ghetto classroom is unfamiliar enough with the speech patterns of the students to be considered as functionally hard-of-hearing for that given situation. Perhaps, pre-graduation auditory training can help avoid the impending initial restrictive communicative barriers between the teacher and the class," they said.

Their research also found that:
Black teachers understood the speech of black children as well as white teachers understood the speech of white children.

Black teachers understood the speech of black children better than white teachers did.

Black teachers and white teachers understood the speech of white children equally well.

Judiciary panel prepared to subpoena

WASHINGTON (AP) - The chairman of the House Judiciary Committee said yesterday everything it has requested from the White House for its impeachment inquiry is relevant and should be supplied.

Responding to White House criticism of the request, Rep. Peter Rodino, D-N.J., said the committee is prepared to subpoena the evidence if the White House refuses to supply it.

Rodino's hard stand in favor of the committee's right to evidence for its impeachment inquiry was fully supported by Rep. Edward Hutchinson, R-Mich., the committee's ranking Republican.

"The requests made to date are very reasonable," said Hutchinson at a joint news conference with Rodino. "The White House should be totally cooperative with us."

The two leaders of the impeachment panel said it was their hope a confrontation with the White House over the furnishing of evidence could be avoided, but that the constitutional authority the committee is operating under leaves the White House no room to refuse its request.

"If the committee feels there is an absolute refusal on the part of the White House to cooperate," said Rodino, "then it will, I'm sure, utilize its subpoena power."

In the meantime, said Rodino, committee counsels John Doar and Albert Jenner will continue to seek a solution to the problem with James St. Clair, Nixon's chief impeachment lawyer.

The news conference was prompted by statements Tuesday by White House Press Secretary Ronald L. Ziegler and presidential counselor Bryce Harlow alleging that the committee was seeking virtually unlimited access to White House files.

The officials also seemed to be suggesting that the committee should decide what an impeachable offense is before Nixon should be required to give it any more evidence.

Both viewpoints were rejected by Rodino, Hutchinson and the two committee counsels.

Doar and Jenner also dismissed the possibility that there was any misunderstanding of the committee's request by the White House.

They said they met for 2½ hours Monday with St. Clair and Fred Buzharit, another White House lawyer, and discussed the request in detail.

"There is no question Mr. St. Clair knows precisely what we are requesting," said Jenner.

Hutchinson said the White House suggestion that the committee define an impeachable offense before preceeding further would be a waste of time.

Even if the committee could decide on a definition, Hutchinson said, the members would not be bound by it.

"In the end," he said, "every member, subjectival, is going to have to define for himself whether the evidence supports a finding of an impeachable offense."

In a separate statement, Republican National Chairman George Bush said the committee in effect forced a confrontation by making a blanket request for documents.

Rodino said the committee has received about half of the tapes the White House has promised that were among the material already turned over to the Watergate grand jury. Doar, at an earlier committee meeting, reportedly said he expected to have all of the material by the end of the week.

Doar said he also received on Wednesday a list from Special Prosecutor Leon Jaworski of the evidence Jaworski had requested from the White House and been turned down. Doar refused to describe the nature of the material.

FBI agents testify: Indians aggressors

ST. PAUL, Minn (AP) - The government called two FBI agents to the stand yesterday to buttress its contention that the occupation force at Wounded Knee, S.D., was the aggressor in gunfire exchanges with officers last year.

The agents testified they were fired on from the grass by a few persons who rode to the eastern perimeter of the village in an old car.

On trial are Dennis Banks, 41, and Russell Means, 34, charged in 10 count indictments in the 71-day takeover of the Pine Ridge reservation village. The counts include larceny, burglary, assault on federal officers and conspiracy.

In another development yesterday, the defense filed a motion seeking dismissal of the 10-count indictment. It argued that governmental misconduct had prejudiced the defendants' rights. Among several alleged examples was the mixup in exhibits supplied by the FBI last week.

Judge Fred Nichol turned down an earlier request for dismissal of the case over the mixup. Government attorneys are expected to file an answer to the latest motion before Nichol makes his decision.

Stephen Travis of the Kansas City, Mo., FBI office related this sequence of events the night of Feb. 27, 1973 and early the following morning:

He was among more than a dozen FBI men, U.S. marshals and Bureau of Affairs BIA policemen who gathered on a paved road south of Wounded Knee, after word spread there had been shooting in the village.

Shortly before dawn, he, agent Frank McGinn and two BIA officers drove in two cars to a hill about a mile or more east of Wounded Knee.

At daybreak, a 1959 Chevrolet was driven from Wounded Knee toward the sloping hill. Three or four persons got out and the car disappeared behind a small hill.

Questioned by Asst. U.S. Atty. R.D. Hurd, the witness said, "Within a few minutes, we received gunshot from their positions. Possibly there were more than 30 and less than 50."

Hurd asked: "Did you return that fire?"

Travis answered: "After not more than five minutes, we requested permission by shortwave radio to protect ourselves and return fire, which we did."

The agent said he and McGinn carried revolvers and he believed the two BIA policemen carried sidearms and one had a rifle. He said none of the four law officers was struck but the BIA car had a bullet hole.

Agent Lawrence Dick, Minneapolis, said he was in a group of four FBI men and some BIA officers near where Travis was located. Dick said that through binoculars he saw the red and white car parked near a church, before it was driven to the hill prior to the shooting.

Govt. loans granted to Nixon's brother

WASHINGTON (AP) - Columnist Jack Anderson said Tuesday that President Nixon's brother Donald got a $100,000 personal loan from a California builder in 1971 at a time when the builder was seeking a federal contract.

Anderson said it was the second major loan Donald Nixon obtained from government contractors. He noted that in 1956 he got a $205,000 loan from billionaire Howard Hughes, then a defense contractor.

The 1971 loan came in the form a $100,000 check, dated Aug. 4, from Lloyd Hallamore, then president of Hallamore Homes Inc., Anderson wrote in his column. He said Securities and Exchange Commission records show that in July 1971, Donald Nixon became a director of San-Bar Electronics Corp., "a closely affiliated Hallamore firm."

Both Peace Corps and VISTA have job openings for college grads, people with some practical experience in a trade and people with a first-hand knowledge of poverty problems. VISTA wants people to serve in places as diverse as Appalachia and Detroit; Peace Corps has requests for volunteers in 58 developing nations.

Representatives will be on campus soon looking for people with majors and experiences like these, to go into programs beginning in July-September:

VISTA: Law, Pre-school, Special Ed., Psychology, Guidance Counseling, Social Sciences, Recreation, Journalism, City Planning, Home Ec., Construction work, Carpentry, Community Health, Lab Technician, PE, Elementary-Secondary Teaching, BBA's, Accounting, Architecture, Civil Engineering, Voc Ed, Spanish majors & fluent speakers, Personnel Administration, Pharmacy, Agriculture, LPN.

Peace Corps: Architecture, Ag Economics, Biology, Liberal Arts, Ag Engineering, Accounting, Public Administration, Agronomy, Plant Pathology, Business Administration, Geology, Home Ec-Nutrition, Hospital Administration, Construction work, Auto Body Repair, Medical Technology, OT, Public Health, Plumbing, Elementary & Secondary Teaching, Civil Engineering, Speech Pathology, Cabinetmaking, Surveying, Statistics, Heavy Equipment Operators, Industrial Arts, French-Spanish majors and fluent speakers, MS and BSRN's, Math and Science.

The above is only a partial list. We're looking for people about to graduate in many fields and people with farm experience and rural backgrounds, problem-solving experience, literacy, tutorial and organizational experience.

Peace Corps and VISTA pay a living allowance travel, medical expenses and a completion-of-service allotment of $50-$75 per month on the job.

Representatives will be on campus March 19-21. Stop by the Placement Office now for more information and to sign up for an interview.

U.S. and the world

Sears claims Nixon unaware of Vesco contribution

NEW YORK (AP) - Government witness Harry Sears ended seven days of testimony in federal court yesterday with a sworn assertion that President Nixon knew "nothing whatever" of a secret $200,000 campaign contribution from financier Robert Vesco.

Sears had testified at the criminal conspiracy trial of former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and ex-Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stans that Vesco said he took the Fifth Amendment at a fraud hearing to protect the President. The Securities and Exchange Commission hearing was held shortly before the 1972 presidential election.

"As far as you know, did Mr. Nixon have anything to do with this $200,000 contribution?" asked Asst. U.S. Atty. John Wing.

Shouted objections arose from defense attorneys, and U.S. District Court Judge Lee Gagliardi promptly sustained them. However, Mitchell's attorney, Peter Fleming Jr., suggested a stipulation on the record "out of fairness to the President."

"That's what I'm trying to bring out," Wing declared.

The objections then were withdrawn and Sears answered in response to the question as to whether Nixon had anything to do with the $200,000: "Nothing whatever."

The indictment charges that in return for the contribution, Mitchell and Stans sought to impede an SEC investigation into Vesco's multibillion-dollar corporate empire.

The charges against them are conspiracy, obstruction of justice and perjury, punishable upon conviction by a maximum of 50 years in federal prison.

Sears and Vesco were named defendants in the indictment, but Sears was granted total immunity from prosecution in return for his testimony. Vesco fled the country and is a fugitive.

During his weeklong testimony, Sears described numerous meetings and phone conversations with Mitchell in 1971 trying to get an appointment with Casey to discuss Vesco's troubles.

He said that early in 1972 he first told Mitchell that Vesco might make a large campaign contribution. He described how he helped deliver the $200,000 cash to Stans secretly on April 10,1972, three days after a law became effective requiring such contributions to be reported.

From Stans' office, Sears said, he went directly to Mitchell's office, and told Mitchell of the contribution. Mitchell picked up the phone, he said, called SEC Chairman William Casey, and made an appointment for Sears to see Casey the same afternoon. He described his meeting with Casey as "productive."

On cross-examination, however, Sears said that he never tried to "fix" the Vesco case through Mitchell, nor had he asked Mitchell to "fix" it. And he claimed he told Stans when the money was delivered that it was a political contribution and nothing else was involved.

Wing strongly attacked Sears Wednesday because of the latter's obvious concern for Mitchell during cross-examination. In several instances, Fleming evoked testimony from Sears that was favorable to the former attorney general.

Under Wing's questioning, Sears admitted that at one point he had lied to the grand jury that returned the Mitchell-Stans indictment, "because I didn't want to bring Mr. Mitchell into the thing."

"You didn't intend to show a connection between the contribution and the SEC case," Wing prompted.

"I knew there was no connection and it would only be bringing in a man who was a good friend," Sears declared.

Sears was asked if through a political contribution, a loan arrangment and a $60,000-a-year salary Vesco had put him "in a box."

The witness was Republican majority leader of the New Jersey State Senate before going on Vesco's payroll at the end of 1971.

"He had me in no box, or by the way, in no pocket," replied Sears, a reference to an earlier government that he was in Vesco's pocket.

Barth backs Nixon deductions

WASHINGTON (AP) — Roger V. Barth, former deputy chief counsel for the Internal Revenue Service, says he believes the President was correct in taking every possible deduction from his income taxes.

Barth also said White House memos in 1969 asking about possible tax deductions "were entirely consistent with the President's statement he was not intimately involved with details of his tax returns."

He saw the memos as requests for "sound tax advice" for the President.

"I think a fair reading of these memos would indicate the President or his advisers - on assuming a new office - would be thinking about the general subject of tax returns and tax affairs," Barth said.

Barth, who resigned from the IRS last year and now is with a Washington law firm, said he had never heard of a request from the White House to see tax returns of other presidents.

There have been news reports that such a request was prepared so that Nixon could get evidence for his tax returns based on what other presidents had done.

Barth said in an interview he is sure such a request never reached the IRS because he had checked with then IRS commissioner Randolph W. Thrower, who, Barth said, had not heard of it either.

"One of us would know about it," he said.

Barth, 35, said he has testified several times before the Congressional Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, which is investigating the President's tax returns, but didn't know whether the President also was being investigated for tax fraud.

But he added, "I can't conceive of the President being involved in any tax fraud."

Asked about presidential aides who helped prepare the returns, Barth added, "or his aides."

Barth, a former advance man in the 1968 Nixon campaign, was named an assistant to the IRS commissioner in 1969 and became deputy chief counsel in 1972.

Saxbe: newsmen wiretapped in former administrations

WASHINGTON (AP) — Atty. Gen. William B. Saxbe suggested Wednesday that newsmen may have been the targets of government wiretaps during the Kennedy and Johnson administrations.

But former President Johnson's attorney general, Ramsey Clark, declared "it never happened" during his term of office from late 1966 through 1968.

Saxbe told reporters he has reviewed a file of national security wiretaps from 1960 until 1973 and found such eavesdropping widespread during the previous two Democratic administrations.

Justice Department spokesman John W. Hushen said later that Saxbe was referring to a list of wiretaps prepared by the FBI last summer at the request of then Atty. Gen. Elliot L. Richardson.

Hushen said the list does not show whether newsmen were among those whose telephones were tapped.

Saxbe said all of the taps were authorized by previous attorney generals. Clark said he approved no taps on newsmen, but said it is possible one such case occurred before his administration.

Clark called it "perfectly outrageous" for Saxbe to suggest that newsmen were wiretap targets without offering specific evidence to back up his statement.

Saxbe said the file is classified secret.

The attorney general said he offered the file to special Watergate prosecutor Leon Jaworski because he thought it might have some bearing on Jaworski's investigation of Nixon administration wiretaps on four newsmen and 13 National Security Council aides. But the attorney general said Jaworski replied that he already had the information.

The list apparently included details of more than 2,000 national security wiretaps. The White House has previously made public the numbers of taps employed from 1945 through 1972, and the figures for the Kennedy, Johnson and Nixon administrations range from a high of 260 in 1964 to a low of 82 in 1968.

At one point, Saxbe flatly stated that newsmen were wiretap targets during the Kennedy and Johnson years.

Pat Nixon marvels at Venezuelan parade

CARACAS, Venezuela (AP) — America's First Lady Pat Nixon watched a parade of goose-stepping Venezuelan soldiers celebrating President Carlos Andres Perez' inauguration Wednesday and said the "precision was tremendous."

Anti-riot cars, tanks, running squads of paratroopers and guerrilla fighters and hundreds of soldiers in colorful uniforms went down the mile-long parade highway for two hours in a hot sun.

Mrs. Nixon did not get to sit in the presidential box as had been anticipated by U.S. aides. Instead, she watched from an adjoining box with 291 delegates to the inaugural from 87 countries.

When she arrived, Mrs. Nixon said, "I'm going to enjoy it I'm sure. I love ceremonies."

She seemed to be less enthusiastic after the display of military might, calling it "a very interesting parade."

It was totally military, unlike American inaugurations, which are filled with gay floats. The ceremonial parade grounds with grandstand covered with solid concrete sunshades, were built during the era of former Venezuelan dictator Marcos Perez Jimenez.

Across from the presidential reviewing stand was a bank shell, where musicians from all military forces kept up a constant blare of martial music.

Beyond, on the hillside, could be seen slum housing in a section called "El Valle." Alongside were new, tall apartment units whose construction was started two years ago under outgoing President Rafael Caldera.

The mammoth parade highway outside of Caracas can hold 250,000 persons in its immense grandstand. But it was a workday in Caracas and there were many empty seats.

Mrs. Nixon, in a yellow linen dress, was winding up a three-day ceremonial visit to Venezuela as President Nixon's personal representative to the inauguration.

The energy crisis

Reserve oil supplies to be released if Arabs act soon

WASHINGTON (AP) — Deputy Federal energy chief John C. Sawhill said yesterday the administration will release reserve petroleum supplies to give the economy a quick boost once Middle East oil begins flowing.

Meanwhile, President Nixon met with key advisors on energy problems and Arab oil ministers gathered in Tripoli, Libya, amid indications that an end to the oil embargo may be near.

The White House, however, played down the importance of Nixon's meeting with his Emergency Energy Action Group. A spokesman indicated that there would be no important policy announcements unless the Arabs acted.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Gerald L. Warren said Nixon and his associates discussed the impact of the oil shortage and the search for alternate energy sources.

Although Sawhill gave no indication when the five-month-old embargo might be lifted, he said one of the first priorities "will be to draw-down inventories to secure levels, so that we can release the energy supplies needed to support sustained economic growth.

Addressing a seminar on the energy crisis sponsored by the Oil, Chemical and Atomic Workers International Union, Sawhill hinted that government audit of the oil industry by a task force from the Federal Energy Office and Internal Revenue Service may produce startling revelations.

"I suspect that in the very near future we will be making some headlines," he said after AFL-CIO President George Meany charged that the oil companies "have a stranglehold on the American economy." The administration Meany, added, "has done nothing to find out how hard they are squeezing."

The labor chief called for tough congressional action to deal with the oil producers and an override of Nixon's veto of emergency energy legislation that would roll back oil prices and provide special unemployment compensation.

DST may save time, but not electricity

Two months of winter Daylight Time hasn't saved any measurable amount of electricity, say utility officials contacted in an Associated Press survey.

Electricity consumption in most areas is considerably lower than had been expected, but officials credit conservation efforts and generally milder weather with the decrease.

"We have not been able to distinguish any changes as a result of Daylight Saving Time," said R.L. Hancock, director of the Austin, Tex., utilities. He said consumption was running 12 to 15 per cent below last year.

James Burdeshaw, director of power marketing for the Tennessee Valley Authority, said, "We have been unable to identify any reduction because of Daylight Saving Time. There has been less growth in energy use than expected, but that is largely due to a combination of unseasonable warm weather and to the reaction of the public to conservation efforts."

The Edison Electric Institute, which compiles nationwide statistics, said yesterday that during the week ended March 9, 1974 Americans used virtually the same amount of electricity as they did in the corresponding period last year. The 1973 figure was 33.452 billion kilowatt hours; the 1974 figure was 33.443 billion kilowatt hours.

The normal anticipated growth rate would be 7 to 8 per cent. On the average, in the 19 weeks since the end of October when energy conservation drives began, consumption has been about 1 per cent less than in the same period last year. There was no significant change after the introduction of Daylight Saving Time.

A spokesman for Southern California Edison Co. said, "I think basically there's a conservation ethic here. The customers are interested in conserving because it's more or less a patriotic thing to do."

During the week ended Feb. 20, the company's 2.5 million customers used 19.5 per cent less electricity than had been anticipated. The spokesman conceded that higher prices might have encouraged customers to be more careful of how much electricity was used. Rates went up an average of 42.5 per cent for residential customers last year, mainly because of higher crude oil costs.

Federal legislation passed late last year put the nation on year-round Daylight Saving Time effective Jan. 6. The idea was that an extra hour of daylight in the afternoon would save electricity. A move to repeal the measure failed in the Senate last week.

The Federal Energy Office has promised a report in June on the effectiveness of Daylight Saving Time as a conservation measure.

The officials agree, however, that the switch to Daylight Saving Time has had only a minimal effect. Some said increased use of electricity in the morning offset any saving in the evening.

Wildcat coal strike disrupted by gunfire

CHARLESTON, W. Va. (AP) - Gun fire hit the West Virginia coalfields as Gov. Arch A. Moore, Jr. acted yesterday to end a severe wildcat strike by suspending a controversial rule limiting gasoline purchases.

Moore suspended for 30 days his rule that prohibited service stations to sell to anyone whose tank was more than one-quarter full. But it was not certain if that suspension or a federal court order would end the 17-day walkout that now idles 27,600 miners.

Gunshots rang out shortly before midnight at the Keystone No. 1 mine of Eastern Associated Coal Co. in McDowell County, the heart of the strike area. Two pickets were injured seriously, and a woman who had stopped to chat suffered less severe injuries.

"Since this has happened, I don't know whether lifting the quarter-tank rule will help or not," said a miner who has been active in the protest movement. Referring to the limited back-to-work order issued by a federal judge in Virginia, the miner said, "I don't think it will have any meaning now."

The strike began over short supplies of gasoline, but has continued despite renewed supplies in the area, which is deep in the Appalachians in the heavily unionized southern part of the state. Miners had demanded that Moore rescind the quarter-tank rule. But coal and steel company officals have charged the reasons for the strike are intraunion politics and maneuvering in advance of this fall's coal industry contract talks.

The walkout has crippled production of mettalurgical coal, which is necessary for the production of steel. U.S. Steel has already laid off 300 workers, put others on short work schedules and said up to 30,000 workers could be out of work by the end of the week.

Moore said yesterday that he never believed the gasoline issue was the cause of the strike. He said he had been told that up to 98 per cent of the men off the jobs want to go back to work.

A McDowell County deputy sheriff said the shootings of the two men and the woman occurred at a major mine where the entire work force wants to go back to work. However, as long as the pickets remain the miners will not work.

Officials said five men were picketing the Keystone mine when rifle fire started from the top of a hill. When they started down a road, shots also came from the foot of the hill, catching them in a cross fire. Authorities said Jerry Jenks and Roby Castle, both in their early 30s, were admitted to a hospital in Welch, where Jenks was in critical condition and Castle listed as satisfactory.

The federal court order was issued by Judge Emery Widener of the 4th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals. It ordered members of 27 UMW locals in District 17 to return to their jobs. However, the order apparently does not apply to UMW District 29, which is the heart of the strike area.

Embargo rumored ended

TRIPOLI, Libya (AP) — The Arab oil ministers ended a one-day meeting here late yesterday, and a high Libyan official said they had decided to lift the oil embargo against the United States.

The official added they would not officially announce it in Tripoli, however,

The oil ministers adjourned their closed meeting without announcing any decision. The Libyan official said the meeting would be resumed in Vienna, Austria, on Sunday.

Libya had been identified as one of the chief opponents of lifting the ban imposed during the October Middle East war.

Egypt's President Anwar Sadat had pressed the Arab oil exporters for weeks to lift the embargo in recognition of American efforts to obtain an Israeli withdrawal from the Suez Canal.

The Tripoli meeting ended at 11:30 p.m. — 4:30 p.m. EDT — less than six hours after it began. Algerian Industry Minister Belaid Abdesselam chaired the session.

He is current president of the Organization of Arab Petroleum Exporting Countries.

The Arab oil ministers' meeting was the third attempt to bring Arab oil producers together to consider an Egyptian-backed request for an end to the oil embargo.

The meeting was first scheduled for Feb. 14 but did not take place then because of Algerian and Libyan opposition. A meeting in Cairo last Sunday also was blocked by the two holdout nations.

Drug legislation

WASHINGTON (AP) - Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, D-Mass., said yesterday he will introduce legislation within a month to curb what he called promotional abuses in the drug industry.

Kennedy said his Senate health subcommittee has been "enormously distressed" by testimony of witnesses describing the effects of cat-and-dog competition among manufacturers of 20,000 brand-name drugs with only 70 different chemicals entiries.

The consumer apparently pays for it both ways," he said, with $1 billion in promotion costs passed along in the form of higher drug prices and excessive prescribing of antibiotics that has contributed to the estimated 100,000 deaths each year from resistant bacteria.

Back to the warm

LISBON, Conn. (AP) — Roman Buffin is crawling between warm, clean sheets since Sept. 18.

"It feels so wonderful. Clean sheets. Warmth. And I don't have to grope around in the dark with a flashlight anymore," said the ex Marine. His cold, dark winter ended when dozens of citizens across the country sent money to help him out of his financial plight.

On Sept. 18 the Connecticut Light and Power Co. cut electricity to his five-room all-electric house because he couldn't pay the $367 bill. But with donations from strangers he made a payment on the bill and power was restored Feb. 25.

An anonymous samaritan also paid his $137 phone bill.

"The experience has really taught me a lot," said Buffin.

"It really makes me appreciate what it's like to have a phone and not have to get in my truck and drive to a pay phone."

Without heat during his ordeal, Buffin slept on a couch in the living room in front of the fireplace. He used an outdoor privy and drew water from a well.

Stories of his plight prompted letters from as far away as California.

Abortion decision

BOSTON (AP) — The state Supreme Judicial Court is considering whether a husband's right to have a family can override the rights of his wife who wants an abortion.

The court also was asked to consider the "potentiality of human life" as a possible right of the unborn child of a woman 4½ months pregnant.

The questions came in the case of a 27-year-old Greenfield truck driver and his 23-year-old wife. The full court of seven justices heard arguments in the case in a more-than-two-hour special session Wednesday.

The court proceeding was begun by the husband last Friday when the wife was having preliminary X-rays in a hospital preparing for an abortion.

Supreme Court Justice Paul C. Reardon issued a temporary injunction Friday halting the proceedings pending a decision by the full court.

A doctor said Friday that a decision would have to be made quickly, before the unborn child went into the final three months of gestation.

The woman said she decided to seek an abortion after she and her husband separated last month. She said her husband said he would not support the child and did not want his name on the birth certificate.

Her lawyer, Paula Gold, said the wife is on welfare and has received only $50 in support from her husband since they separated in January.

Mark Berson, the husband's lawyer, said the husband has a "fundamental right" to intervene and stop an abortion as soon as the child has entered its second trimester of development.

Berson said that the ruling in a recent U.S. Supreme Court case appears to give the wife the right to have an abortion during the first three months of pregnancy, but argued that the husband has rights in the child after that.

Sanitary violators

BOSTON (AP) — Boston's Board of Health and Hospitals yesterday approved a regulation requiring public notification through the media of restaurants that fail to correct violations of the city's sanitary code.

The restaurants would be listed on a news release that would be issued on a regular basis, at least monthly, a spokesman said. The listing would include the name and address of the restaurant as well as the violation.

The spokesman said there would be three inspections and a public hearing before the restaurant was listed on the release. A restaurant could be listed for one major violation or a significant number of minor violations.

The first list of offending restaurants is expected to be issued in about 60 days, the spokesman said. Before the list is released, restaurant owners will be fully informed about the new regulation.

Capital punishment

BOSTON (AP) — On a 23-14 roll call vote, the Massachusetts Senate approved a mandatory death penalty bill yesterday for nine categories of murder.

The House-passed bill now needs routine enactment in both chambers before going to Gov. Francis W. Sargent.

Sargent has said he will veto the bill.

He pocket vetoed a similar bill after it passed in last year's session.

The Senate vote would make the chance of overriding a veto close.

The bill passed the House by a two-to-one margin.

Sen. John J. Conte, D-Worcester who is carrying the bill in the Senate, said after the vote that he could accept an amended bill limiting capital punishment to murders of policemen and firemen.

Sargent indicated last year that he would favor such a limited bill, subject to approval of the state Supreme Judicial Court.

A motion to send the measure to the court before approving the bill was killed Wednesday on a 15-22 roll call vote.

The bill calls for the death penalty for those convicted of murdering policemen, firemen or prison officials; for murder in the course of a kidnaping; for murder by someone previously convicted of first degree murder; for murder for pay; murder in connection with a rape, murder with extreme atrocity or cruelty, murder during a hijacking, murder during a breaking and entering, and murder during armed robbery.

Before you pull the lever

By HOWARD SPIER

That nice, little quaint saying, 'buyer beware', holds great significance when one is considering the election of politicians. For almost 200 years men and women have been running to the political forum in order to sell their goods to the American consumers in a package deal, otherwise known as a platform. The barter system consists of selling a particular political platform in exchange for votes. The price is actually fairly cheap until you consider the consequences which may ensue.

Some of the more important political philosophies purchased by the American people had a tremendous effect upon this nation's development. In 1824, we paid for imperialism as a part of the Monroe Doctrine. In 1937, we bargained for the New Deal which was responsible in shaping todays worklife. 1952 saw the purchase of the Cold War and in 1968 the American consumer once again returned to the market place and bought notions of 'Law and Order'.

What will the American consumer by buying in 1976? It looks as though personal vendettas will be the product of the year. The Congressional elections which took place in Michigan, and Ohio provide a good example of this. The winner of each election sold himself as a non-Republican and a non-sympathizer of Richard Nixon. These tactics will assuredly be cancerous in affecting 1976 election campaigns. Republicans who wish to seek election will deny any affiliation with Mr. Nixon or they will allege that 'Watergate' was the sole responsibility of a few misguided individuals. On the other hand the Democrats will wrap themselves in the name of their party. I could just see the Democrats walking down the street and muttering, "I am a Democrat and not a Republican", or "Richard Nixon exemplifies the kind of person who belongs to the Republican party". However, I again pose the following question, "What will the American consumer be buying in 1976?"

The days of telling the people where you stand on a handful of issues has ended. It is now up to the American people to do their own homework, and explore the qualifications of each candidate. Knowing that the person up for election never cheated on his income taxes or never embezzled money and that he is a Democrat are not the types of issues we should be solely concerned with.

Remember, we are trying to choose leaders, not Sunday school teachers.

Ban non-deposit containers

To The Editor:

I hope all students who get the Globe noticed the article on Page 11 of Monday's issue. It was about a bill before the state legislature on banning no deposit containers. For those who didn't read it, I'll summarize some of the main points.

1. Six cent deposit on beer and soft drink cans holding less than a quart. Ten cent deposit on larger containers.

2. Deposit of half that amount on standardized containers that may be reused by any bottler.

3. Ban on flip top containers beginning Jan. 1976.

4. Benefits; lower beverage prices. "It costs 15-20 percent more to buy beer and soft drinks in non-returnable throwaway containers."

Oregon has experimented with this legislation since 1972 and found that there was a net gain of 260 jobs in transportation and reuse of containers. Vermont is also trying to get legislation like this.

This is a very positive legislation. I urge everyone to take a few minutes and part with an 8 cent postcard and write your legislator. CEQ--are you listening? You haven't been doing too much since those newspaper bins!!!

Southwest has job openings

To The Editor:

There presently exists in Southwest two student vacancies on two very important functioning committees. First, there is an opening on the Search Committee for a new area director. The work on this committee involves both weekly meetings (Wednesdays, from 11:30 a.m. to 1:30 p.m. and Fridays, from 3:00 to 5:00 p.m.) and some additional outside work. The bulk of the work of this committee should be completed by early May.

The Budget Committee of the Southwest area also has an open position for this semester. This committee's meeting's are held weekly on Wednesdays at 4:00 p.m. The Budget Committee is a student-staff group which is responsible for the development of the total budget for the Southwest area.

Both of these committees are open only to residents of Southwest. Applications are being accepted until Monday, March 18, 1974 and are available in the Southwest Assembly office in JQA lobby. For further information please contact me at the Assembly office (tel 5-1552).

Wondering who is what?

To The Editor:

While rapping with a Gay Vietnam Vet, I heard a phrase which further confirmed my feelings about the military. He stated, "I killed ten men, and got a medal". With the same half-sick smile on his face, he continued, "I Loved one, and got a dishonorable discharge." It does make me wonder who is perverse, or sick.

How much is that Jesus in the window?

To The Editor:

Have you seen Jesus? I did, once long ago, and for a long time he brought joy, comfort, and peace into my life. But lately I seem to have lost Jesus, and I'd like to ask some of my fellow students to help me find him again.

You see, Jesus is my dog, and I lost him a couple of days ago. He's part beagle, part something else, I really don't know what, brown with black spots and a couple of feet high. Any way, I lost him at a party in Cance a couple of nights back — I bring him to parties because he's really funny after a couple of drinks, rolls on his back and bays at the moon, although he's a smart dog really and does a lot of tricks. Well anyway, Jesus is gone from my life and I really miss him — also I've got a lot of leftover Alpo spoiling in my room because I don't have a fridge.

If you find Jesus, please let me know. I can't offer any reward because I need all my money for my scene design class, but let me know anyway. If you want to receive him into your life for a couple of days, that's OK, but don't make it too long because he's my dog after all and any way he's kind of funny around strangers. Answers to the name of "Jesus".

Dating will never be extinct

To The Editor:

With respect to Mark Dlugosz's letter, "UMass Dating Dull," March 12, I'd like to comment on a few points. Don't panic Mark, dating will never become extinct. The decline in dating on this campus is merely a sociological characteristic of our age group.

As far as co-ed living and co-ed card playing go, is there an easier or more relaxing way to meet and interact with women? I mean, there they are, just waiting to play cards with mature men like yourself. You don't even have to go to the Blue Wall. You can buy some liquor and create your own "un-phony" atmosphere right in your own room.

I assume that you come out and walk around campus at least once a day. If so, how can you possibly print a statement saying that, "There doesn't seem to be any place in the UMass vicinity where members of the opposite sex can meet." Open your eyes or ask someone. This isn't an all male community. There are plenty of people just like you and I who want to meet people in a natural way. But you take an unnatural stand by stereotyping UMass women. Maybe you are your own problem. Maybe if you treated UMass females as women, or better yet, human beings and not as "girls" or dates, then perhaps they might respond to you accordingly.

What it boils down to Mark, is that by stereotyping people you are locking the door to understanding human relations, which apparently you don't.

Woody Stanwood

Don't like UMie dating? Go somewhere else

To The Editor:

I am writing this in response to Mark Dlugosz's editorial that was in the Collegian yesterday, on the dating situation at UMass.

I agree with him in that there has been a decrease in dating due to co-ed living conditions, and that "you rarely develop a relationship out of a bar room meeting." However there are many other places to go around here and lots to do if you just look around and make plans.

In Dlugosz's opinion "it has gotten to a point where the stereotyped UMass girl is one with horn-rimmed glasses, hair that she ran an electric current through, and patched jeans." In my opinion the stereotyped, shall I say "boy", at UMass, is something beyond any kind of appropriate description.

Dlugosz stressed that "UMass has a very large population of girls with boy friends at home. They come to UMass because it is a cheap place to go to school while they wait for their boy friends to graduate or make a start in life." Dlugosz is passing judgement on a whole population of women that he obviously knows nothing about.

Granted, there are some women on this campus that are here for worthless reasons, such as looking for a rich husband, but I can truthfully say that more women are here for other obvious reasons such as getting an education so they can get out of their male dominated ruts and become independent self-supportive individuals. Furthermore, I know many women who would like to date but find it awkward to ask men out (since men have stopped asking women out). A man wouldn't know how to handle this situation anyways because his domineering role would be threatened. Unfortunately, most women won't go ahead and make the first move regardless of this fact, so I only have one thing to say to Mark Dlugosz: It's your choice! Take it or leave it.

Religion unfashionable

I haven't seen a Hare Krishna person in months. Guru Mahara ji's disciples haven't been on campus in weeks. And I almost, but not quite, forgot who Josh is.

Where in hell have all the spiritual nuts gone?

Heaven only knows but thank God they're out of here.

Seeing the Hare Krishna people for the first time was a fairly interesting experience. I mean how many times do you see a bunch of bald-headed people playing the finger cymbals, chanting and dancing around Boston Common dressed in flimsy night gowns when it's five degrees below zero. They drew a real crowd.

It was only after the twenty-fifth time I was approached that I informed the Hare Krishna people in harsh language that no, I did not want to gain great spiritual knowledge for only $12.

When the 17-year-old perfect master, Guru Mahara ji's people were here to speak for the first time last year I went to get saved. I left the meeting only after his sweet, loving, kind followers threw a guy out bodily for standing up and asking what all the stuff they were talking about meant.

On the David Susskind show last week there was a woman shoplifter discussing her life of crime. I was leaning over to the TV engrossed in her story and understanding completely just how she had gotten caught in this tangled web when she said that she had been saved from all this by the teachings of the Guru Mahara ji. I decided to go out and steal something.

Josh. With a publicity campaign like his how could you forget the guy? His followers had the campus saturated with false advertising weeks before he showed up. (Sorry folks but I never found him to be what you said he was.)

I went to the Student Union Ballroom to hear him talk about sex (this topic drew hundreds of UMies.) I was sitting next to his wife and she was becoming and smiling so much I thought her face was going to fall off.

Josh's talk covered a sizeable range of bullshit which was pretty amazing for the time he spoke. When he was done he came over and I introduced myself and he pumped my hand up and down and he was smiling and beaming so much that I thought his face was going to fall off too. All I could think of was what it would be like to be his wife and have to wake up, roll over, and see him very morning.

But where have all the leaders and their dazed, glassy-eyed followers gone?

Is religion going out of style again?

A Marty Moronsky day

Anyhow, the other day, I was sitting around Paul's room, watching television. Paul has his television hooked up to the cable they have coming into the dorm, so he gets a shitload of stations. Well, the Three Stooges were on, so we watched them for a while. The first two only had Shemp, but the last one was with Curly, and they did the "Swingin' the Alphabet" routine. Wow! I hadn't seen that one in a long time.

When the Three Stooges were over, I thought we should put on an album, but Paul wanted to watch the news. I don't usually watch the news-it's really boring. I mean, I'd rather hear the Gratful Dead anytime,but the news was on, so I watched it.

Well, the guy came on and he started talking about this chick who was captured by some group that calls themselves the Symbionese Liberation Army-what a wierd name. Anyhow, it sounded like this chick was really in tough shape and that nobody really gave two shits about her. That really bummed me out.

Then they started talking about all these guys that used to work for Nixon, that are all going to jail for one thing or another. Everyone in the room started laughing about it. Paul said it was funnier than the Three Stooges. Everyone else agreed, but I didn't think it was very funny. I was bummed out. I don't think I'll watch the news anymore.

We went to dinner, and went back to my room afterwards. I put on some Grateful Dead, and we all sat around trying to figure out what to do. There's not much to do around here during the week, and after an hour of debate, we decided that there weren't any bars or movies that would be acceptable by all eleven of us. I had just gotten used to the fact that we'd probably end up sitting around and getting high for the rest of the night, when Carl said, "Let's go streaking!." I wasn't really into it, but I said I'd go if everybody else did. I mean, there was nothing better to do, and it was pretty warm out. So we all went streaking. It was alot of fun and we got a big cheer from JQA, but it didn't keep us busy for very long.

So we went down to the Bluewall. You know, the Bluewall's a pretty funny place. Carl, my roommate, told me that the Bluewall sells more beer than any other place in New England. I can understand it-I had at least two full glasses of beer on my shirt by the time I walked out.

Of course, by that time, everybody was pretty loaded, and I didn't really care what was on my shirt, as long as I could get back to my room and crash out. So we went walking to Larry's car, which was parked in one of the lots near the Campus Center. We didn't have too much trouble finding the lot, but Larry just couldn't understand where the fuck his car went. He knew where he parked it, but it wasn't there. The only thing that was there was a sign reading, "No Parking, Tow Zone."

Larry was really pissed, but I calmed him down and told him that I'd go up to the towing place with him to get it. He agreed, and the two of us thumbed up to get his car. When we got there, this older guy was half asleep in the office. He looked at us like he was kinda mad that we woke him up, and Larry told him that he wanted his car back. The guy didn't seem very friendly. It was almost like it was his car and Larry was trying to steal it. When Larry pulled out his checkbook to pay the guy the fifteen bucks to get it back, he pointed to a big sign on the wall that read, "No Checks Please." Larry told him he didn't have enough cash to cover it, but the guy didn't care one way or the other, and he said to Larry, "Well then, I guess you'll have to come back and get your car tomorrow."

With all the cars on this campus, it seems really strange that these guys make all his money hauling our cars around, and then give us shit when we go to get them back. Carl thinks the students should have their own towing place. After all the shit we went through the other night, I'd have to agree with him. It can't be any worse!

Anyhow, by the time I got back to my room, I was so tired that I didn't even take off my clothes before I went to bed. I knew I'd be pretty sore the next day from streaking, but I didn't really care. It was just one of those days.

Listen Lou; I know that he is the first streaker we've arrested, but did we have to frisk him?

Letters Policy

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian welcomes all letters to the editor. They must be signed, and include the author's address and phone number. Also, all letters must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces per line, and no more than two pages.

Organizations may submit letters, but they must include a name and phone number for reference purposes.

All letters are subject to editing, for either content or space, according to the judgement of the editors. Due to space limitations, there is no guarantee that all letters received will be printed.

Marriage: getting into and out of it

By RICHARD M. HOWLAND
Attorney For Students

The complexities of getting into and out of the marriage relationship should, in my opinion, not be the subject of very much law at all. Historically, the chief reasons for an elaborate legal structure in the area related primarily to property rights, land ownership and descent and distribution through inheritance. Most of the compelling reasons for the laws in the area have diminished with the greater sophistication of the legal structure and the emphasis on human rights that is evident today.

DIVORCE

In Massachusetts a divorce may be decreed for:

1. Adultery (sexual relations outside of the marriage);
2. Impotency (inability of have sexual relations);
3. Utter desertion for two years;
4. Alcoholism or drug addiction;
5. Non-support of the wife by the husband when able; and
6. Cruel and abusive treatment.

"Cruel and abusive treatment" is the most common ground. Some unique or repeated act, which need not be necessarily physically abusive or injurious but which gives rise to mental anguish as evidenced, for instance, by loss of weight, nervousness, hospitalization, psychiatric consultation and the like, is usually sufficient.

In addition to the ground for the divorce, the spouse filing suit (the "libellant" must live in Massachusetts if the grounds occurred outside the state. A person may not move to Massachusetts solely for the purpose of obtaining a divorce. It is a necessary element of a divorce proceeding that the parties lived together as husband and wife at some time in the Commonwealth.

Massachusetts still subscribes to the notion of fault in divorce and as a consequence there is really no secure way of proceeding without the assistance of at least a lawyer for the libellant.

The things that the lawyer must attend to besides the court paper, hearing and decree even in a consensual divorce are:

1. Distribution of assets;
2. Support and custody of children (if any);
3. Conveyance of real property and motor vehicles;
4. Alimony, if any; and
5. The technical grounds.

These matters are generally taken care of by agreement before the proceedings are over and are time consuming.

Before papers can be filed the parties must physically live apart for thirty (30) days. Persons contemplating divorce are urged to discuss the matter with appropriate psychological or marriage counsellors, together or separately both before and during the divorce proceedings.

The wife may assume her maiden name at the time the divorce is granted if she petitions to do so. In some courts, however, the judge may refuse alimony if the wife resumes her maiden name. This does not affect support. Ask your lawyer about this.

Divorce laws and practices are changing. Some groups are urging and some individuals are obtaining divorces without assistance of counsel. No fault divorce laws are growing more common. Most of the impediments to divorces in cases where the marriage relationship has in fact disappeared are being removed. There is much room for reform in Massachusetts and many groups are organized to support reform. Persons contemplating divorce are urged to obtain counsel whenever children, property or technical problems occur. In most cases legal help is necessary to get the process properly started and concluded without serious delay.

Marriages may be solemnized between people over eighteen years of age without parental consent. In order to get a license each party applies for a license at the Clerk of the City or Town of residence. If both live in the same town only one license is required, otherwise two are required. Each party must have a blood test and, usually, a brief physical examination by the physician. Except for a waiver from the judge, three days is required before a license will be issued. The license requires names, occupations, addresses, birthplaces, and ages of the parties, both of their parents' names, and record of dissolution of any prior marriage.

A marriage may be solemnized by any religious leader of a recognized religion or by a Justice of the Peace. Information on local persons qualified to solemnize marriages is available from the Clerk who issues the license.

There is no particular form or set of vows or, for that matter, any specific requirement for the way in which the solemnization of the marriage is to occur provided by any statute. Any form or ritual is a matter for the religion involved or if none is subscribed to, then it is a matter which is entirely up to the parties involved and the person who is to solemnize the occasion.

Notes, quotes and anecdotes

DVP needs members

Applications for membership in the Distinguished Visitors Program (DVP) are now available in the Student Activities office and at the Campus Center Information desk.

DVP is the major student lecture organization on campus and each year brings to the university community a schedule of well-known speakers. The program is aimed at providing a diverse, balanced series covering many interests and major viewpoints. So far this semester DVP has presented Stuart Udall, former Secretary of the Interior; David Graham DuBois, son of W.E.B. DuBois; Michael Oehler, a homesteader and John Boone, former Massachusetts Commissioner of Correction. DVP also sponsored one night of the National Women's Poetry Festival.

Each spring the committee is the principal sponsor of the Martin Luther King, Jr., Memorial Lecture Series.

DVP is entirely student run and student funded. The committee seeks members with varied backgrounds, interests and academic fields.

Membership on the committee involves deciding which speakers will be invited to speak here, working with lecture bureaus and working with other members of the committee and the university in setting up the speaker's schedule for his engagement at UMass.

Curriculum varies

The School of Education is currently operating under a curriculum process called Flexible Curriculum whereby learning experiences do not necessarily conform to the three hour a week semester long University standard. Consequently, throughout the semester various learning experiences become available that may or may not have been communicated at the time of registration.

Students desiring to sign up for these learning experiences or get more information about them should contact the School of Education Registration and Advising Offices on the first floor of Hills House South.

Live off-campus

University policy exempts only the following students from living on campus: those currently married and listed as such in the registrar's office, senior, those 21 years of age on or before the first day of classes in the fall. If you are in one of these categories and wish to move off campus, go to the Housing Office, 235 Whitmore, and fill out the necessary forms. If you are not exempted under this policy, you may apply for a special exemption; applications for these exemptions are now being accepted from students living in the Southwest Residential College.

Exemption's will be considered on the basis of acute need in any of the following areas: financial, health, academic interships, environmental problems, religious reasons. Any request for exemptions MUST BE SUBSTANTIATED in writing.

Further information and applications for exemptions may be obtained in George Washington Lobby, Room 1. They must be returned with all supporting documents by April 12.

If you plant to commute from home or the home of close relatives, or if you plan to be married before or during the fall semester, you may apply for an exemption directly through the Housing Office, 235 Whitmore.

Sun will provide great source of energy for future

By JOHN DEAN

Each day we are constantly being bombarded by energy. Government officials spasmodically react to the citizen's cries for new sources of power to keep the wheels of technological society rolling. For the past fifteen years we have been pouring money through the nuclear sieve with little substantial progress to show for the billions of dollars spent. We are told that the technology to solve the problems which pervade the usage of nuclear power is just around the corner; only a decade or two away. Solar energy provides an enormous quantity of energy of which about 3,600 quintillion (1 quintillion equals 10^{18}) British Thermal Unites strikes the earth. To get a perspective on the situation, the total energy budget for the U.S. in all forms is about 0.2 quintillions per year. The solar energy spread out over the entire surface of the earth is equal to 1 kilowatt per square mile per day. Little of this energy is used by society today (except in the form of fossil fuels) even though much of the technology is now available for its use. For years the power companies have been leading us down a pernicious path laden with insidious potholes, and now is the time for the public to become aware of the alternatives that are available which are truly "safe, clean, and effective".

The solar energy process is essentially that which brings energy to the surface of the earth via light and heat from the sun. One of the oldest of these processes is that of photosynthesis. Our agricultural system is based on photosynthesis and for many centuries man relied soley on this method to provide heat (wood burning), food, and energy (animal power). Even the fossil fuels which provide much of our power today are a product of photosynthesis, time, and pressure. One form of solar energy which has been used off and on with varying frequencies over the last fifty years is that of hydroelectric power. Heat from the sun is used to evaporate water which later precipitates in the form of rain. Through the evaporation-precipitation process, water is moved from a low point to a high point. Man catches the water at a high point and lets it run through a machine that takes the potential energy out of the water and uses it to generate electricity. This is not one of the least destructive means of utilizing solar energy. Many of our river systems are now "tame" and because of this, much change "good and bad" has ensued. This form of solar energy has been utilized quite a bit in the United States and does not appear to be an avenue for much further energy production in most parts of the U.S.

The sun's heat can be captured by a process called the low-temperature photo-thermal process. This consists of a shallow green house-like setup called a flat plate solar collector which collects heat energy from the sun. It is called a low temperature device because the temperature is never allowed to get above that of boiling water. The warmth produced can be used to heat a home if a working fluid (air or water) is pumped through this flat-plate collector and then transfered into a radiator in a house. One could, if one wished, build this setup today to heat a home. The technology is available and you could, if you wished draw up your own plans and purchase all necessary parts.

William Heronemus of the Civil Engineering Department here at UMass has done extensive research in the field of solar energy. In a conversation with Professor Heronemus about this subject, he told me he felt that "by 1978 you will be able to buy the hardware from a reputable dealer and install it like a furnace would be installed". It would be possible to mount such a device on your roof, garage, or in your front lawn depending upon which area would receive the most amount of light. The initial cost of purchase of such a device would be high at present, though the savings in costs of fuel oil or heating electricity would be substantial.

According to Professor Heronemus, one of the best ways of producing electricity by solar energy is that of the wind power process. Different natural processes such as differential heating and cooling of the atmosphere, and evaporation and precipitation, all work as "one great big heat engine" and cause velocity, you've created momentum which can be exchanged in a momentum exchange device such as a windmill for energy. The wind power process has been used for centuries by many civilizations to do such varied things as pump water, mill flour, drive factories, and move ships. Professor Heronemus thinks that wind power "can start delivering large quantities of electricity to our systems in four or five years if we want it to, and economically.". A study done on the assesment of solar energy as a national resource by a panel from the National Science Foundation and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration in December of 1972 estimated that "the power potential in the winds over the continental U.S. is about 10^{11} kilowatts electric". So this is by no means a low energy yielding process.

Professor Heronemus is involved, along with ten other professors and fifteen students, with a solar energy process called the ocean thermal differences process. The sun warms tremendous amounts of surface sea water while at the same time the water down 1200 feet into the ocean is close to freezing. This tremendous temperature gradient can be used as a fossil fuel plant utilizing its self-produced temperature gradient to run a turbine in the production of electricity. The thermal difference must be at least 30 degrees F, and does not occur everywhere in the oceans. The ocean thermal difference power plant consists of a boiler through which hot surface water passes and a condenser located below in the cool water. In between these two is a closed cycle which feeds gas into the bottom of the bioler, which vaporizes the gas, which expands, and goes down through a turbine, which turns to produce electricity. This setup can be incorporated onto a semi-submergable ship which could store the electricity in the form of hydrogen gas produced by electrolysis of water or at an offshore site where the electricity produced can be transported directly to the land. Professor Heronemus feels that with a "major national commitment, there could be a pilot plant running in six years". This process could produce at least 26 trillion kilowatts per year from the south eastern U.S. alone, according to the NSF-NASA Solar Energy Panel.

One of the most recently demonstrated solar energy processes is that of the photovoltaic cell. The cell uses direct radiation from the sun and sky to produce electricity. Even on a cloudy day, there is sufficient radiation to produce electricity via this cell. This method has most recently been tested in the United States manned and unmanned space program and has worked very effectively. This process could in the future be used to run and power buildings. Professor Heronemus predicts, that one day we will shingel our roofs with them to produce electricity for home use. The NSF-NASA study points out that "Large photovoltaic systems for terrestial use have not been built, although the basic technical ability exists". Currently the major fault of this type of system is the prohibitive costs of the cells which makes their use on any widespread basis impossible. This is a process which, because of economic and developmental factors, may not be adopted for a number of decades.

Another possible means of converting the sun's energy into electricity is by "beaming down", in the form of microwaves, energy collected from the sun by satellites circling the earth. The microwaves could be collected and received on cloudy or sunny days, and would provide an almost constant supply of energy. This process is only in the early planning states, according to the NSF-NASA Solar Energy Panel and will not be able to be implemented for many years.

Buenos Aires and good times

By ROBERTO AGUIRRE

Spring vacation is around the corner and many UMies will soon be absorbing rays in Florida, Bermuda and the like.

Roberto Aguirre, a UMass graduate student studying civil engineering, has another suggestion for a vacationland, his native city Buenos Aires.

Buenos Aires, since 1880 the capital of Argentina, is a metropolis which is open to everyone, native or foreign. It was founded in 1536 by Pedro de Mendoza, evacuated by population soon afterwards, and founded for the second and definitive time, in 1580 by Juan de Garay. The city is located on the 60 mile wide River Plate, and bounded by Avenida General Paz; about 3 million inhabitants live in its 75 square miles. But to a certain extent the city extends beyond Gen. Paz to the Greater Buenos Aires, surrounding districts with a further 5,300,000 inhabitants, the total census population is 8,324,615.

In the morning the action is in downtown district, the "centro" (the city), actually at the eastern tip of the urban area. Five underground lines, which carry a total of 280 million passengers yearly, include 8000 buses, 30,000 taxis, 300,000 cars, and 90,000 vans.

For those with leisure time, mornings can be spent playing golf, or riding on the Palermo's paths, the Buenos Aires equivalent of the Bois de Boulogne.

Buenos Aires is a city of flowers and trees, where newstands with hundreds of different Argentines and foreign magazines, and also newspapers in Spanish and in foreign languages, fill the insatiable desire for information.

For a gastronomic interlude, Buenos Aires is the cheapest city in the world on his vital matter. Breakfast, any time between 8 a.m. and 10 normally, lunch between 12 p.m. and 2, a five o'clock tea, and dinner usually around 9 p.m., are occasions on which to sample yet again the proverbial excellence of Argentine cooking.

There are places where the speciality is barbecued meat, Argentine beef is first rate everywhere and in the staple dish in private homes and wherever people get together to lunch or dine. There are places where Spanish and Italian cooking predominate, apart from the more ususal "international style" (China, Germany, Greece, The Arabian States or the Balkans).

Another thing the leisurely minded can do is to penetrate in the heart of the city visiting the relics of Colonial architecture such as can be found in San Telmo, or the gaily painted houses of the Boca, the magnificent Palermo and Recoleta. Parks and plazas abound in statuary, churches ancient and modern offer treasuries of art and tradition, as well as historical relics.

One of the most famous Gardel's tango says something like "My dear Buenos Aires, when I get to see you again", such is the magic of one of the world's biggest and yet most livable cities.

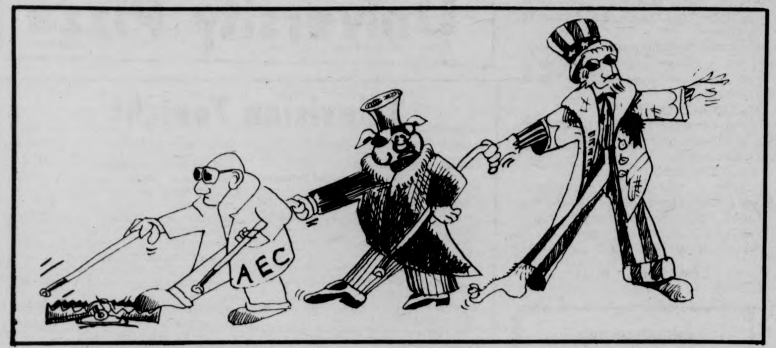
Sun will provide great source of energy for future

By JOHN DEAN

Each day we are constantly being bombarded by energy. Government officials spasmodically react to the citizen's cries for new sources of power to keep the wheels of technological society rolling. For the past fifteen years we have been pouring money through the nuclear sieve with little substantial progress to show for the billions of dollars spent. We are told that the technology to solve the problems which pervade the usage of nuclear power is just around the corner; only a decade or two away. Solar energy provides an enormous quantity of energy of which about 3,600 quintillion (1 quintillion equals 10^{18}) British Thermal Unites strikes the earth. To get a perspective on the situation, the total energy budget for the U.S. in all forms is about 0.2 quintillions per year. The solar energy spread out over the entire surface of the earth is equal to 1 kilowatt per square mile per day. Little of this energy is used by society today (except in the form of fossil fuels) even though much of the technology is now available for its use. For years the power companies have been leading us down a pernicious path laden with insidious potholes, and now is the time for the public to become aware of the alternatives that are available which are truly "safe, clean, and effective".



"GENTLEMEN, WE'RE ONTO SOMETHING SOLID!"

The solar energy process is essentially that which brings energy to the surface of the earth via light and heat from the sun. One of the oldest of these processes is that of photosynthesis. Our agricultural system is based on photosynthesis and for many centuries man relied soley on this method to provide heat (wood burning), food, and energy (animal power). Even the fossil fuels which provide much of our power today are a product of photosynthesis, time, and pressure. One form of solar energy which has been used off and on with varying frequencies over the last fifty years is that of hydroelectric power. Heat from the sun is used to evaporate water which later precipitates in the form of rain. Through the evaporation-precipitation process, water is moved from a low point to a high point. Man catches the water at a high point and lets it run through a machine that takes the potential energy out of the water and uses it to generate electricity. This is not one of the least destructive means of utilizing solar energy. Many of our river systems are now "tame" and because of this, much change "good and bad" has ensued. This form of solar energy has been utilized quite a bit in the United States and does not appear to be an avenue for much further energy production in most parts of the U.S.

The sun's heat can be captured by a process called the low-temperature photo-thermal process. This consists of a shallow green house-like setup called a flat plate solar collector which collects heat energy from the sun. It is called a low temperature device because the temperature is never allowed to get above that of boiling water. The warmth produced can be used to heat a home if a working fluid (air or water) is pumped through this flat-plate collector and then transfered into a radiator in a house. One could, if one wished, build this setup today to heat a home. The technology is available and you could, if you wished draw up your own plans and purchase all necessary parts.

William Heronemus of the Civil Engineering Department here at UMass has done extensive research in the field of solar energy. Dear Aggie

Dear UMies,

I have this terrible problem. Actually, I have two. The first is very sinple and can be easily eradicated. It is the fact that nobody writes to me. I am supposed to write a column answering people's letters twice a week, but if no one writes any questions, then I find it hard answering something that doesn't exist. I need people's problems (or even just warped senses of humor like mine) to keep my column going — at least comments on what you'd like the column to consist of — facts, real advice, sick humor, no humor, — anything, just some feedback.

My other problem may be my own fault, but exists nonetheless. I am misunderstood. People I know keep coming up to me and saying, "What did you tell 'em to do that for?" I ask, "Did you think that was a serious answer?" And then they say, "You mean, this is supposed to be funny?" How can I get across the fact that this article up 'til now by demand, has been a take-off on a real column like this? True, some of the letters written are real, but who can take letters like that seriously? If you want the column to be serious, write in serious problems. If you don't want a column, write in telling me you don't want a Dear Aggie Column. But, please, until it's very obvious, don't take this column so seriously. You're wrecking all the fun! Look at it from a satirical point of view. Compare it to Dear Abby or Ask Beth and see how close I come to being as absurd as they are sometimes. I'm not putting them down, just poking fun. If you want some real counseling, I can handle it. I didn't start out as a satirist. Believe it or not, I started out as a counselor. Surprise!

So please, Dear UMies, tell me what I should do?

A Frustrated Columnist

House votes student loans

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House has acted to make federally guaranteed loans for college students more readily available to middle income families.

By unanimous vote Tuesday it passed a bill that would permit families with incomes under $15,000 a year to get a guaranteed loan of up $1,500 without submitting to an analysis of their financial needs.

Senate action is still required. The current requirement for a needs analysis for families in the middle income range has drastically reduced eligibility for the loans, the largest of the federal aid student programs.

St. Croix poet to read works

As a part of this week's National Women's Poetry Festival, Winnie "Oyoko" Loving from St. Croix, the Virgin Islands, will share her work with the UMass community on Friday. March 15th.

Ms. Winnie "Oyoko" Loving is a poetess, playwright and a writer of children's stories. She came to public attention in the Virgin Islands following her conducting of a poetry and cultural event in St. Croix in 1973 which featured a unique combination of poetry, jazz, singing and art.

Hailing from Roxbury, Mass., Ms. Loving is a teacher of the third grade at an elementary school in Concordia. She received her B.A. in Sociology from New College of the Sacred Heart in 1969 and completed her M.S. in Education at Wheelock College in 1971.

Ms. Loving will read her poetry in Room 101 of the Campus Center at 3:00 p.m. this Friday.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Scorpio on her way to the top: singer Melba Moore. This dynamic, future superstar declares, "I stated five years ago that astrology was no fad and that as people became aware of its value it would remain a popular, viable subject, and I was right."

ARIES (March 21-April 19): You discover grass is not necessarily greener elsewhere. You are restless but you should also be selective. Meet people and learn from them. But where travel is concerned, it is best to reflect rather than take direct action. Be patient!

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): Money matters grab spotlight, more so than usual. Key for best results is review, check and double-check. Take inventory. Be aware of policies, clauses, claims. One closely associated with you may seek a new deal.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Avoid quick changes, decisions. Give yourself time to reflect, meditate. Those who advocate otherwise may not be seeing picture as a whole. Take special care around machinery, electricity. Gain is indicated through written word.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): Family situation requires special attention. What was a skeleton in closet begins to rattle. Be fair but firm--diplomacy is necessary, not weakness. One close to you confides problem. Don't cast first stone. Keep diet, health resolutions.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Judgment concerning opposite sec may be clouded by fantasy. Know it and give logic equal time. Avoid tendency to deceive yourself. Pisces, Virgo persons might figure prominently. Refine techniques. Review past lesson.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): This is pressure time. You deliver or step back--you win or lose. Emphasis is on security, prestige and responsibility. You will be rewarded for efforts--you also will pay a price for errors. No one ever promised you a bed of roses.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): Finish rather than begin projects. Get finger on pulse of public. Ride with tide. Many around you tend now to say one thing, believe another and do something else. Key is to stick to your own plans and principles. Complete special task.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Money could slip through your fingers unless you get strict accounting. Don't play games with numbers. Obtain facts--take case and let credit go. Highlight independence, originality and creative endeavors. But don't try to "buy" intangibles.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22-Dec. 21): Cycle is high but illusion could cause you to distort facts. Means know who is bluffing, who is truthful--and know where your own position is in relation to truth. Above all, don't fool yourself. Frank talk with one you view in mirror would be most constructive.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan. 19): Diversify. A cliche now applies: Don't put all eggs in one basket. Persons who have remained out of sight may have good reason for so doing--good for them, not for you. Be sensible enough to delve into crevices. Get answers, not evasions.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20-Feb. 18): Some of your hopes, wishes have not been in line with reality. Now you get chance to rectify past mistakes. You can tear down for purpose of construction. What appears to be negative could rebound in your favor.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Study Virgo message. Be ready to utilize information obtained through persistent inquiry. Take nothing for granted. Analyze. Find reasons. Gemini, Virgo persons could play significant roles. Insist on direct confrontation with one in authority.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are attractive to opposite sex, restless, possess great intellectual curiosity, and you draw to you persons born under Capricorn and Cancer. June could be your most important month of 1974. You are a rare combination of sensitivity and toughness--you do best under pressure when time appears to be running out.

O'Brien to speak tonight

AMHERST — Governor's Councillor Edward O'Brien of Easthampton, an announced Democratic candidate for the office of Massachusetts Attorney General, will take his campaign to UMass tonight.

At 7:30 p.m. O'Brien will address Project 10's Political Campaigns Seminar in Classroom I of Pierpont Hall at the University. At 8:30 p.m. he will speak in Room 169 of the Murray D. Lincoln Campus Center.

The public is cordially invited to attend.

O'Brien, an Easthampton attorney and former Hampshire County Commissioner, is the only Democrat from western Massachusetts seeking nomination for a statewide office in the September 10th Democratic primary election.

Civil service grants raises

June '74 graduates meeting superior academic achievement criteria, such as a "B" grade average or graduation in the upper third of one's class, will now qualify for beginning pay of $11,297 per year (GS-7), up from $9,969. Starting salaries for other graduates is $10,467 (GS-5), up from $8,055. Candidates with advanced degrees or professional experience will qualify for higher grades. The increases were authorized by the Commission under its authority to set salaries above regular statutory rates, and comparable to nongovernmental salaries, to help meet Federal recruiting needs. The new rates apply nationwide to all engineering and architectural specialties.

The highest demands are in the more traditional specialties of electrical, electronic, civil, and mechanical engineering. The best placement opportunities are on the West Coast, in the Mid-West and Middle Atlantic regions. Opportunities are good elsewhere except more limited in New England and in the Rocky Mountain States.

NCAA tourney outlook

By HAL BOCK

(AP) — Sixteen teams go after rung two on the ladder leading to the National Collegiate Athletic Association college basketball championship Thursday night as the tournament's regional playoffs continue.

Doubleheaders are set at four sites with defending champion UCLA and Michigan, representing the Big Ten Conference, making their playoff debuts.

Second-ranked UCLA, shooting for an unprecendented eighth straight championship, battled its way into the tourney by whipping No. 15 Southern California for the Pacific Eight crown last Saturday. The Bruins go against No. 20 Dayton at Tucson, Ariz. In the other half of the doubleheader, No. 17 New Mexico will oppose unranked San Francisco.

Twelfth-ranked Michigan, which beat No. 10 Indiana in a playoff for the tournament berth last Monday night, goes against No.3 Notre Dame at Tuscaloosa, Ala., in a Mideast playoff. No. 7 Marquette plays sixth-rated Vanderbilt in the other half of that doubleheader.

In the East regionals, No. 5 Providence faces top-ranked North Carolina State and Pittsburgh, ranked No. 13, takes on unranked Furman at Raleigh, N.C. The Midwest showdown at Tulsa, Okla., sends host Oral Roberts, unranked, against Louisville, No. 16, and No. 14 Kansas vs. No. 19 Creighton.

Also on tap Thursday is the opening round of the first Collegiate Commissioner's Association tournament at St. Louis, with Toledo playing Arizona State and Southern Methodist facing Southern California. The National Invitation Tournament in New York gets under way Saturday.

UCLA Coach John Wooden, advises against paying any attention to what's happened before, now that teams are in tournament play.

"As one might expect," he said, "any team left in this NCAA championship tournament must be capable of beating any other team." Then Wooden added an ominous note:

"I think we are ready," he said.

Mostly, that's ominous for Dayton and Coach Don Donoher. "We're not the kind of team that can stop UCLA or Bill Walton," said Donher, whose team did stop Notre Dame 10 days ago.

The Sports Mailbag

On intramural improvement

To The Sports Editor:

We would like to direct this letter to the Intramural Office and specifically the supervisors and organizors of the Basketball Intramural Program. In our opinion the entire intramural program here rates as one of the top in the country and because of this, we feel that they should constatnly be on the lookout for ways to improve it. Thus, the reason for this letter.

We, as members of the Kennedy Panthers Basketball team in the High-Low Rise Division of the Resident Hall League have been victims of unavoidable circumstances which resulted directly from the present system of supervision.

In our first game of the season, some five weeks ago, we played against the Moore Bullets. The game was a close and exciting one which was ended in what seemed to be a one point margin of victory for us. We went on to win the next four games, as did the Bullets, ending the regular season with a perfect record and an assured playoff berth.

Much to our disappointment and surprise we were notified three days ago that we had actually lost our first game by a point making Moore the division champs and the sole possessor of a playoff spot in our league. It was found that the tallysheet for the game was marked wrong and we were actually awarded two more points than we should have been.

The question arises now as to the validity of the scoresheet that was checked for verification of the records of the two teams. The regular procedure for keeping score is that two people, each picked by the two teams playing, are to keep score, count rebounds, fouls, and individual points. Human error is in all cases possible and must be lived with but biased scorekeeping is also possible and no case should be tolerated. Especially when the division championship and the chance to play more games after the regular season is at stake. We are not accusing anyone of cheating on either side in this case, although it is possible, but emotions and the possibility of overlooking a basket here and there are very much a part of the scorekeeping procedure and also are more probably happenings.

We suggest here that the intramural supervisor who doesn't seem to be overburdened with taking care of the clock keep score, thus eliminating much more emotions and biased feelings than are taken care of now and making a more accurate account of the game itself.

We wish Good Luck to the Bullets but we also remind them that come next year THE CAT WILL BE BACK!!!

Celts eclipse Suns, 104-97

BOSTON (AP) — The Boston Celtics pulled away in the third period on the shooting of John Havlicek with Dave Cowens on the bench in foul trouble Wednesday night for a 104-97 National Basketball Association victory over the Phoenix Suns.

Havlicek scored 10 of his game high 22 points in that period as the Celtics moved out from a two-point halftime lead to an 82-74 advantage after the first basket of the fourth period.

Red Sox vanquish Twins 7-2 for 5th

ORLANDO, Fla. (AP) - Carl Yastrzemski and Orlando Cepeda led a 15-hit attack Wednesday as the Boston Red Sox breezed to a 7-2 exhibition victory over the winless Minnesota Twins.

Yastrzemski singled across a run in the first inning and then drilied his second homer in five games over the fence 330 feet down the right field line in the third.

Cepeda, asily retired his first three times at bat in his Grapefruit League, hit a mighty homer some 400 feet in the sixth. After the blast against a stiff wind, he lined a single to left in the eighth.

Yaz, Cepeda, Luis Aparicio, Dwight Evans, Rico Petrocelli, Bob Montgomery and Doug Griffin had two hits each. Rick Miller was the only Boston player who went hitless as the Red Sox posted their fifth victory in six games.

Runners were on base all afternoon. Boston left 15 runners stranded, Minnesota 11.

Southpaw Bill Lee and right-handers Rick Wise and Diego Segui shared the Boston pitching. Lee allowed five hits in four scoreless innings. Wise was nicked for an unearned run and a homer by Joe Lis while allowing four hits in as many innings.

Segui, counted upon heavily as a top short relief pitcher this year, struggled through the ninth. He didn't allow a hit, but issued three walks, filling the bases before getting Harmon Killebrew to round into a game-ending force play. Killebrew was hitless in five trips to the plate.

The loss was the sixth in a row for the Twins, who were ordered back to the field for additional work after the game, which last two hours and 48 minutes.

The Red Sox have two games on tap Thursday against the Houston Astros in Winter Haven. Dick Pole, Craig Skok and Steve Barr will share the pitching in the morning "B" game, with Reggie Cleveland, Dick Drago and Lance Clemens scheduled for the regular afternoon assignment.

Sockin' with the Sox

Marichal is ready

By DAVE O'HARA
AP Sports Writer

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) - Juan Marichal, the major league's biggest winner with 238 victories in a brilliant career with the San Francisco Giants, is set for his debut with the Boston Red Sox.

The 35-year-old right-hander, delayed in reporting to training camp until March 5, pitched batting practice Wednesday before the Red Sox' exhibition game with the Minnesota Twins at Orlando.

"He looks good," pitching coach Lee Stange said in observing Marichal on the mound. "Look at him, he's throwing everything, a curve, slider and the screwball. He'll probably pitch Friday when we play the New York Mets."

"I feel good," Marichal said after doing some wind sprints in the outfield. "I stayed in shape during the winter by pitching about once a week and it hasn't been too hard here. I've concentrated on strengthening my arm and legs. Now I want to start pitching."

The Red Sox, admittedly shooting for the pennant under new manager Darrell Johnson, took a gamble and purchased Marichal for a reported $100,000 from the Giants in December. With Marichal, the club picked up a $144,000-a-year contract.

There's a good chance that Marichal will make his American League debut April 9, when the Red Sox play their first game in Boston against the Baltimore Orioles.

The Red Sox open the season with three games scheduled in Milwaukee April 5-7. The best long-range guessing is that the Boston pitchers against the Brewers will be Luis Tiant, Bill Lee and Rick Wise. That would leave either Marichal or Reggie Cleveland ready for the Boston opener.

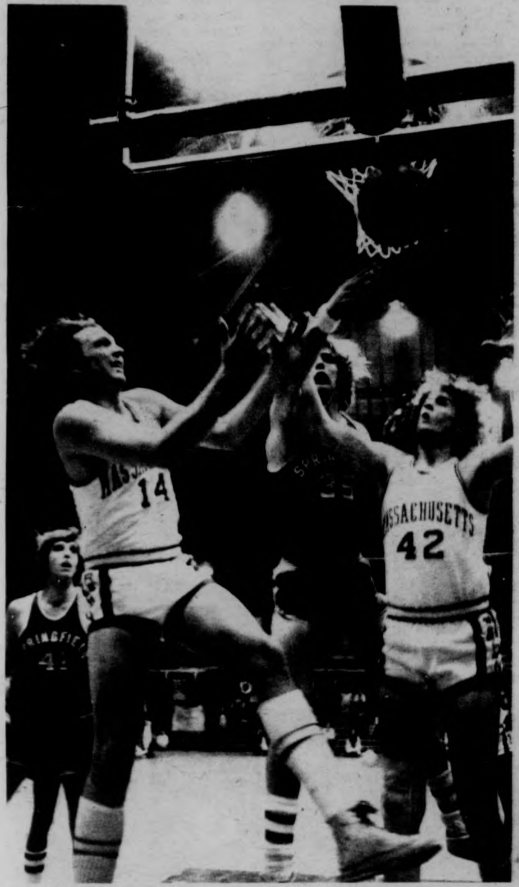
The NIT Minuteman...1974.

21 and 4...it's not over yet!



It was the season of 108-38.

That's they way it will probably be remembered, unless the Minutemen decide to make some noise at the NIT.

After all, it was everything the season represented: a total team effort, several outstanding individual performances, good shooting, super "D", and a total domination of the Yankee Conference.

Granted, there were some pitfalls along the way. If basketball games were several seconds shorter or longer, as the case may be, the Minutemen would head into New York with a record of 24-1 instead of the present, and still very respectable mark of 21-4.

The Minutemen made the Cage the most exciting place on campus while they were here. Showing the true meaining of the term 'home-court advantage', never did an opposing team escape from Curry Hicks with a 'W' alongside their name in the box scores.

But the Minutemen also showed they could play on the road, an important fact since tournament games would never be played in the Cage. The rout of Fordham and control of New Hampshire at hostile courts near season's end bodes well for tourney time.

And the future is now. Even 108-38 is forgotten. Jacksonville and come what may stand in the way of UMass' visions of grandeur and immortality.

The script and the climax of this scenario of incredibility have yet to be taken to press. To be sure, the story will, eventually, be written. But the black and white of history will only record a small impertinent part of what has been and what will be written.

—Steve DeCosta

Man on the street speaks out on NIT

By GLENN POSTER

"What's an NIT?" "Is that the thing being held in Boston?" These and other questions were being asked around campus the past few days as tap-off time at Madison Square Garden draws ever so closer. Well the time has come to find out what other people at-large on the UMass campus know about this post-season basketball tournament. So my next step was to go out and play the old-man-in-the-street role.

First we should hear some quotes from those who know how the NIT system works. Here is a student who saw the most recent UMass NIT teams: "If Purdue beats North Carolina, then we have a good change at going all the way. Murphy is going to be the key to us winning. He has got to stay out of foul trouble. The bench should play a big role. It's time for Duarte to blossom as a scorer and rebounder. He's going to be the key to the bench."

Now a quote from an out-of-state UMie, from the Fairfield, Connecticut area to be exact: "I think we're going to win. Fairfield will beat Hawaii because I live near Fairfield.". That sounds logical, I suppose.

"I feel good about it. We're going to win. We'll beat everybody." The power of positive thinking is truly amazing. While on the subject of positive thinking, two female optimists who attend every game had this to say: "Not only are we going this weekend, but we also plan on going again Tuesday night." (to see the Minutemen I hope).

Another optimist feels that, "We'll go all the way. This is the most balanced team we've ever had." Now back to some more "based on fact" opinions. (minus the total optimism)

"We're quick enough. They're big enough. Let the better man win." But aren't we playing a whole team? "We deserved the NCAA." I agree. Then there's the case of a UMie who transferred here this year from Rutgers. "It's a great tourney. I hope it's UMass and Rutgers in the final." Remember what we did to J. J. Jennings and company?

A certified basketball official has the following view: "It's nice for the basketball team. They've done a good job, but there's more important things going on." Please, don't ref any of our games.

Then there are those who are philosophical about the whole matter. "I think the NIT is a glorified collection of semi-elite college basketball teams which is highlighted only by Madison Square Garden. It's not highlighted this year because more people are interested in the NCAA tournament — except for here, of course." The other philosophical opinion: "It's a fantastic opportunity for the basketball team. If we make a good showing perhaps AP and UPI will put us in their top twenty.

This next quote comes from a man who will enjoy the action from the luxury of the Madison Square Garden pressbox. "We'll get into the finals if we give a super-human effort against North Carolina. In all of the games, except for Syracuse, we were scrambling in clutch situations. To win the big games, we can't fall apart."

Then there are, shall we say, the "left-of-center" views toward the tourney. "The NIT is better than the NCAA for UMass fans. The NCAA would have made a greater impact on the UMass program. But for the fans the NIT is a better deal because they can do down to New York, get drunk, and feel patriotic about their school". I'll drink to that.

From a well-known UMass hockey enthusiast: "Anybody whose going to the NIT is a double loser. First they're going because it's in New York and second they're going to a basketball game." I have to give equal time to opposing viewpoints.

The Massachusetts
Daily Collegian
Minutemen
SPORTS

"The NIT should be almost better than a Beatles' concert." "I think it's pretty funny about those guys dribbling down from James House. New York City can be a fun place." "I'm just going down there to have a good time and hit as many bars as I can." Aren't we all?

An interesting bit of light was thrown onto the situation from the Collegian photo editor: "As star photographer it will be a great honor for me to be on the Madison Square Garden floor with the Minutemen. I thought the Providence Civic Center was big, but this is the pinnacle of my sports photography career."

John O'Connell, the Alumni Relations Director for UMass spoke on behalf of those who call this place their alma mater: "Response from alumni in New York City and around New England has been characterized by enthusiasm and many plan to attend the NIT."

The final quote comes from Howard Ziff, professor in the department of Journalistic Studies: "They're going to win it. I'm a loyalist. The Red Sox are going to win the pennant. The Patriots are going to the Super Bowl. The ice will melt on the Whalers in Springfield."

There are still many questions remaining as to what will happen to the Minutemen in the NIT. To find out the answers you're just going to have to be there Saturday night.

Minuteman history of post season play

by STEVE SARACENO
MDC Sports Staff

"1970 and 1971 were more or less pioneer years for us in the NIT", said Jack Leaman of the UMass post-season teams gone by.

"We went to New York in those years without the publicity, experience, and subsequently, the confidence of other teams that had played in the tournament before. Last year and the year it's different".

Indeed it is. The Minutemen's first two tries for NIT wins were in vain, but last year they beat one fine team and lost to another. And big things could happen this year if the Cagers get by Jacksonville.

The road that UMass took to become a bonafide candidate to win a post-season tourney began twelve years ago.

Where was Jackie Leaman in '62? He was right here, of course, as an assistant coach. That year the team went to its first, and so far only, NCAA tournament appearance.

The (then) Redmen lost to New York University in the first game. They have not gone to the big one since.

There was a post-season void of eight years before UMass met Marquette in 1970. It could have been filled with more NCAA appearances, but the selection process, by which the NCAA invited the Yankee Conference champion, was changed.

So, in 1970, the now head coach Leaman brought his charges up against Marquette (eventual winner of the whole thing) in their first ever NIT appearance.

Though playoff fledglings, the team looked good against the Warriors. Julius Erving (in his collegiate heyday) scored 18 and the captain, Ray Ellerbrook, hit for 14. Marquette, 2nd in the nation at the time, could only muster a 27-27 tie at the half.

But Al McGuire, perhaps more at home in NY than any other coach in the tournament, directed his squad to the eventual win, though not by any large margin.

It was an impressive performance for the 18-6 Redmen, and optimistically, everyone looked ahead to "next year" when Dr. J would still be only a junior and greater things than just a relatively close loss could be expected.

As it turned out, everyone would have settled for a remotely close loss.

UMass got its heels tarred against North Carolina, 90-49. Julie played poor in his last college game, scoring only half his seasons average of 27.

The 1971 NIT Lea-men never had a chance against NC (no one else did either: they won the tourney) which graduated several players to the pros.

After a years absence (Erving went to the pros, too) the newly named Minutemen took their third shot at a win.

This time, they were on target.

For once, they drew a team that didn't turn out to be an eventual winner and though still an underdog, upset Missouri, 78-71.

A balanced UMass attack, led by a new Dr. (A), clipped the 16th ranked Tigers and gave the Big Eight a taste of YanCon basketball.

However, the quarterfinals were a different story. They met their maulers of the previous year, NC, and lost 73-63. Though they played excellent defense against the much taller Tar Heels, the shooting failed; the Minutemen could hit only 27 of 70 from the floor.

It was wait 'til next year again.

Now it is next year, and if the Minutemen can top their first two opponents, most probably the Heels will be waiting for them.

Would NC's previous domination over the Minutemen present any special mental block on the part of the players should they meet, again?

"I don't think so," reasons Leaman, "They beat us by 50 pts. the first time and by only 10 the second."

"If we keep improving at that rate, calculate for yourself what will happen."

UMie dribblers going strong NYC, Garden almost in sight

By DAVE EIBEL

The now well known James dribbling dozen left UMass this morning at 6:00 a.m. on their way to New York City and a Saturday night date at Madison Square Garden.

In a conversation last night with the Collegian, group leader Grant Baxter said that the trip almost came to an abrupt end after only 100 yards.

"We left the Campus Garage with our first dribbler Matt Zofra ahead of us, dribbling in balmy 8 degree weather." All of a sudden a UMass policeman came up to us and asked what we were up to. We told him the story and he let us go."

The dribblers made excellent time on the first leg of their trip ending at Avon Connecticut. They were supposed to arrive there at 6:00 p.m. but made it by 2:30 p.m. after dribbling at a rate of eight minutes per mile.

In describing the trip so far Baxter said, "The only thing that bothered us was the cold. Except for a few unfriendly dogs and some dead skunks along the way, the only other problems were trucks whizzing by and the basketballs sometimes going awry."

Baxter complimented the help given the group by police in Massachusetts and Connecticut and discussed the problems incurred by dribbling on public thoroughfares.

"Everyone wants to know what we're doing dribbling along the highway. We've decided, after being asked the question repeatedly, that we are the real UMass basketball team."

Baxter, when contacted last night, added that he was about to join the eleven other Jamesites at an Avon bar with the intention of "showing the good people of Connecticut what true UMies are really like." One prays they hold off on the streaking.

Latest word is that the group will arrive in New York City early Saturday afternoon and then don their "Redmen" warmup jackets (given them by Coach Jack Leaman) and dribble into the Garden ten minutes before the Minutemen.

When the Dolphins of Jacksonville come out on the floor they might think that the twelve UMies are the UMass NIT representatives. If they do Dr. A and company will give them quite a shock.

HOW DO YOU THINK MOST PEOPLE YOUR AGE DIE?

It's not drugs.
It's not suicide.
And it's not cancer.
It's automobile crashes.

More American people between the ages of 15 and 25 die in automobile crashes than in any other way.

At least half of those deaths are alcohol related. And the drunk drivers who cause most of them are under 25. Sometimes, many times, they kill themselves.

One of the most dangerous things you can do is get drunk and drive home.

You can change it. You have to.

You march against the war. You fight for clean air and clean water. You eat natural foods. You practice yoga. You are so much for life. And you are so much against killing.

It would be unthinkable for you to wittingly kill another human being.

So then, why is this happening?

"Games are won by people"

Leaman on NIT

By STEVE DECOSTA

Jack Leaman doesn't like to talk about himself.

On a direct question, "What does the NIT mean to you personally as a coach?", Leaman hedged.

He talked about the worth of the tourney in terms of his team, the basketball program, the fans, and the UMass "basketball family", but not about the personal implications.

Even when the question was redirected, Leaman was not exactly serious. "It means an extra month of work for me," he said.

Then Leaman, a devoted family man, did get serious. "It means that I will miss my daughter skating for the fourth time in five years."

His only daughter takes part in a skating show in Amherst every St. Patrick's Day weekend. But, for the coach, that weekend, at least for four of the last five years, has involved more serious matters, namely the NIT.

"I really wish I could watch her skate," Leaman said. "It's hard to say no every year when she asks me if I will be able to watch her."

Leaman is almost as concerned about his "basketball family as he is about his real relatives.

"The thing that really throws me about the NIT," Leaman said, "is its effect on the University and the Amherst community. St. Patrick's Day in New York has become almost a ritual for our basketball family"

But there are other, more important matters at hand for Leaman and the Minutemen. At the moment, Jacksonville ranks at the top of the priority list.

"Jacksonville is a team of national stature," Leaman said. "They get a lot of press coverage and people all over the country know who they are."

"But when two teams step on the court," he continued, "you have to leave the newspaper clippings in the locker room. Games are won by the people on the floor, not the press coverage."

But you can't knock the committee. "We gotta play with their ball," said Leaman. "Actually, there isn't a team in the tournament that I'd rather play than Jacksonville. It's not that Jacksonville is bad, but that the other teams are at least as good."

On his own team's chances, Leaman said, "This is the best overall basketball team I've ever had. It is my best offensive team by far, especially in regard to shooting, and we play better defense than I thought we could."

"We're maybe one good strong rebounder away from being a super team," he said.

But Leaman or the UMass fans really have got beef. The team has a record of 21-4 and the four teams that have beaten the Minutemen are participating in post-season tournaments.

"It's not bad," Leaman said, "the last five teams to beat us are in tournaments: Providence, Syracuse, BC, Connecticut, and ourselves."

"There is a great sense of satisfaction from the hard work and effort the team has put in," Leaman said. "There are a lot of things in athletics that can't be measured, such as an inner sense of accomplishment."

By returning to the NIT for the second straight year and the fourth time in five years, the Minutemen "have accomplished something not many other groups have. We have a great deal of pride," said Leaman.

If the tournament was won on pride, the Minutemen would be shoo-ins.

But the tournament is won on the court by outscoring evenly-matched opponents. Leaman knows that, and you can bet the players do too.

The first test comes on Saturday, and you can bet the Minutemen will be ready.

READY FOR NIT — The UMass bench looks on expectantly as Coach Leaman looks for a sub to put in. It's hoped the bench will be very productive in Madison Square Garden against Jacksonville Saturday night in the opening round of the NIT.

Al's, Rick's NIT experiences

By EARLE BAROLL

This was to be a follow up to the rumor that both Rick Pitino and Al "Silk" Skinner as little high schoolers had signed their souls and immediate futures to UMass basketball at the very sight of N.I.T. One.

But, as rumors usually pan out, only one party did such and he was Rick Pitino. Skinner says he gave UMass his word prior to the Marquette game. Still, one's romantic enough for us as both Rick and Al will end their careers on the same court where it was supposed to have all began. Sob!!!

Actually Pitino's signing is quite the story. He had been invited to the game and given tickets by UMass and in his words "only went to see the game, nothing else." He had narrowed his final choices to UMass, UConn, Canisius, Niagara and East Carolina. And in truth almost signed with East Carolina earlier in the week.

Now for the good stuff.

After the game Leaman and Pitino were talking on the court when everything but the red carpet was rolled out. "I couldn't believe it," remembers Pitino. "They brought out a table, two chairs and all sorts of writers and photographers."

Leaman asked Rick to sit next to him and promptly produced the piece de resistance, namely a letter of intent to come to UMass. "He asked me right then 'are you going to come with us'," said Rick, "and before I knew it he had narrowed my choice to one school."

Rick signed.

"I guess the surroundings had something to do with my signing then," Pitino said. "But, really when I went to the Gardens on that night I wasn't even thinking about it." Which, is usually the classic case.

Rick's career, of course, is within a game or two or one or maybe four of coming to an end. "I wouldn't be telling you the truth if I said I never thought about it," he lamented yesterday before practice. "I'm undecided about the future. But for now I'm just hoping that I can go out in a fitting way as champions of the N.I.T."

Skinner was at the Marquette game and that's probably why he's linked with Pitino. He insists that he gave his word, not signature to UMass, "and that was good enough for me", he says. Agreed.

"I had already made up my mind to come to UMass," he continued. "I felt at the time that I had made the right choice and the Marquette game didn't effect the decision although I was really impressed with what I saw."

And if you're a recruiting freak Al was also the target of "all the top schools in New England, Pennsylvania, New York and down towards the Washington, D.C. area." Alright, specifically the St. John's, the Syracuse's, and even into midwest with Detroit.

In contrast to Pitino's possible career ending venture to New York, this is only the continuation for "Silk" of a game "I love to play." That means the pros. "Sure, it will be the end of this season and the end of my career at UMass," said Al, "and I'll certainly miss it.

"But, I'm more concerned with this game itself than what Al Skinner will be doing in basketball, because I know I want to go on." And so for Al Skinner the question is going on to where? and as what? ABA, NBA, guard or forward.

"I'll ask the guy who's recruiting me where I'll be playing with that team," said Al, "and then I can work from there to make myself a guard or strengthen myself as a forward. But looking at it now, I would think I'll have an easier time as a guard."

Well, anyways that's Pitino and Skinner for you. And big deal, only one signed at the Garden. We'll say that both did for the sake of rumors and the sake of the romanticism that will follow their final steps as Minutemen. For what these two have done, it would be the only justifiable way.

Discrepancies may exist in business department

By MIKE KNEELAND
MDC Staff

The Daily Collegian has asked the Student Senate Treasurer to conduct a full audit of the newspaper.

The Board of Editors made the request after being told Wednesday that possible discrepancies exist within the Collegian business department.

"There are a number of discrepancies in the Collegian dealing with expenditure of revenues and mismanagement of funds," said Senate Treasurer Paul Hamel. "It's my belief a real problem exists."

Under question are the hiring of three part-time filing clerks by Business Manager Michael Shor and commissions he paid himself for advertisements he did not solicit.

Brent Wilkes resigned his position as Collegian Advertising Manager calling Shor a "basically dishonest and deceitful person." In a letter sent to the Board of Editors Wilkes said, "I resign because I can not believe in a business department that is headed by such a corrupt person, or a paper that allows it to be so headed."

Wilkes said Shor hired friends to perform jobs for relatively high salaries. Wilkes also claims Shor violated unwritten Collegian policy by accepting commissions on advertisements he did not directly solicit.

In a letter also sent to the Editors yesterday Shor said, "My actions were not in any manner an attempt to defraud the Collegian and I did not in my actions feel that I was violating my authority to act in my elected capacity as Business Manager."

He admitted he had paid himself for work done with misrepresented funds. "Without hesitation," he continued, "I look at this in retrospect and say that was improper, and should have been dealt with in a different manner."

In session for more than three hours Wednesday, the eight Collegian Editors heard arguments from Wilkes, Shor and Student Senate representatives who had run a brief check of Shor's salary.

With Shor not being allowed to vote, the Board of Editors voted not to ask for his resignation, but directed him to: "accept no more than $30 a week salary until completion of an RSO audit; define and codify all payment procedures in the business department within ten days; and to return all funds that an RSO audit finds he has been inappropriately been paid."

During the upcoming audit, Treasurer Hamel said the distinction must be made whether discrepancies have occured due to an "error in the system" or to acts "Shor was consciously aware of." Hamel said he did not want to "screw" anyone for errors due to inaccuracies in the system.

Chem. Eng. Dept. researchers plastics through NSF grant

By DONALD WILHELM
MDC Staff

Thanks to research carried on by UMass' Chemical Engineering Department, the manufacturing of plastic may well be less expensive.

The National Science Foundation recently awarded a research grant of $45,300 to measure the properties of plastics when they are strecthed to various degrees. This they hope to accomplish through the measurement of bubble growth and collapse, as present methods of measurement tend to be inaccurate and unreliable. The properties of many plastics vary greatly when stretched. For example, nylon is extremely weak until it is streched to a certain point, and sent through a screen with small holes, at which point it becomes a comparatively strong.

According to Dr. Stanley Middleman of the department, who will direct the research, the University received the grant in part because the facilities at UMass for research on plastics are supposedly the best in the country, which Dr. Middleman believes is evidenced by the fact that the National Science Foundation has selected UMass their main university research lab, and gives UMass $250,000 a year for plastics research.

In addition, Monsanto Polymers and Petrochemicals gave $9,800 for a program which will likewise expedite the manufacturing process. This will fund a study on the physical factors which affect the efficiency of various industrial processes used to mix plastic fluids with other materials, such as mixing plastics with dyes for color films. Some $600,000 a year of research is sponsored by organizations and corporations from outside the university.

In a grant action for education rather than research, the Polariod Foundation gave $8,100 worth of scholarships, which will fund three students for a year. These students will work part time during the school year and full time during the summer at community service facilities, such as at hospitals. The student is not expected to work for a corporation during this scholarship period, which is considered unusual in this type of scholarship.

So, it can be basically summarized by saying that research significant to our society is being carried on by this department, research department members feel does not interfere with the education of the student.

Tower toppler case heads to grand jury

GREENFIELD — Samuel H. Lovejoy, 27, of Montague, was bound over yesterday to the next session of the Franklin County grand jury after a judge found probably cause in a charge stemming from the destruction of a weather observation tower in Montague.

Lovejoy was charged with the malcious destruction of personal property in the Feb. 22 toppling of the $50,000 tower. Northeast Utilities was using the tower to collect meteorlogical data to submit as part of an Atomic Energy Commission (AEC) application for a $1.35 billion twin nuclear power plant on the Montague Plains site.

The Amherst College graduate and member of a literary commune did not take the stand in a one hour Greenfield District Court hearing late yesterday morning. His lawyer, Thomas Lesser of Conway, presented no witnesses and offered no evidence.

He said Lovejoy had distributed a four-page statement explaining his act as civil disobedience at the time of his arrest early February 22nd. "This is an unusual situation because Lovejoy had nothing to gain personally." Lesser said. "He did it for the good of the community."

District Attorney Robert Boyle presented three witnesses in the hearing before Judge Philip Ball on behalf of Northeast Utilities.

The firm said damages to the tower, which was completely destroyed, amounted to $72,000. A new tower erected in its place was put into operation Wednesday, collecting data for an AEC application expected next month.

Lovejoy's case will now come before a grand jury scheduled to convene the first week in May. He was released yesterday on personal recognizance.

Treas-sec Shultz to resign in May

WASHINGTON (AP) - Treasury Secretary George P. Shultz, who for five years has been one of President Nixon's most important most loyal advisers, announced yesterday he will resign in May.

"My time has come to move on to something else and let somebody else do these wonderful things as secretary of the treasury," Shultz told newsmen.

The 53-year-old former economics professor was the last remaining member of the original Nixon cabinet still in the administration.

The White House did not name a successor to Shultz, and White House sources said the President would use the six weaks between now and the first of May to make a decision.

Informed sources said federal energy chief William E. Simon, who also is deputy secretary of the treasury, remains the front runner as Shultz's successor, but is by no means a shoo-in.

In announcing the resignation, the White House described Shultz as "a pillar of this administration and this government" and Nixon said he was accepting it with "a sense of personal regret."

Shultz was named to the first Nixon cabinet in 1969 as secretary of labor. He became director of the new Office Management Budget in July of 1970 and remained in that post until he was named treasury secretary in June of 1972, succeeding John B. Connally.

It was known for months that Shultz wished to resign as long ago as last summer, but stayed at the Work Inc. sees change

Since being established in 1971, Work Inc. has started a food and housing coop movement, bought several apartment buildings which it rents out at low rates, became involved in several city-wide and national issues, started an income tax clinic with Movement for Economic Justice, formed 2 day care centers with parent control built in to the structure (one in a black church and the other with Spanish Speaking families) and is starting a third center.

Most important, however, is the change and hope that is beginning to develop within the community.

Much of this activity has been made possible by loans from people all over the country and from selling shares or exchanging them for labor.

This has happened because Work Inc. has consistently shared its ideas and resources with groups and people in the "movement" and has hosted countless travelers and students, answered mountains of correspondence, and using the Resource Center newsletter, made exchange subscriptions with hundreds of groups throughout the country.

Simple ways in which students may help this corporation increase their "profit" for the cause of the poor is by saving postage stamps (used or unused), green stamps and coupons and mailing them in to Work Inc. Orders for Work Incorporated's newsletter ($2 per year-8 issues), shares of stock $1.10 per share) and hand puppets ($1.35 and $1.50 and 15 cents for the pattern) will be gladly taken via mail. If interested in more information dealing with Work Inc. contact: Work Incorporated, 652 South East St., Holyoke, Ma.

Social change agents might be shortchanged next year

By MARK VOGLER
MDC Staff

Social change agents at UMass may be getting shortchanged in funding for next year when the undergraduate student senate holds its annual budget hearings.

UMass student senate leaders told the Collegian this week that despite the growing commitment by the University to social problems, these student organizations would be the most likely facing budget cuts-because their goals are not directed on campus.

Talks of possible budget cuts are due to the "hard financial state of affairs facing everybody at this time," says Senate Speaker David Booker.

According to Booker, "these social action groups do a great deal of good for the inmates; and they do a lot of good for the students involved.

"But as student senate speaker I do have to question the legitimacy of the role of the senate in their funding. More aid should be coming from the state.

"A lot of groups will be disappointed that we have to cut back some money, anyway. And I think the on campus activities--the one's directly benefiting the students--should receive priority."

The groups which may be subjected to the budget cuts include:

--Belchertown Volunteers-a number of students who spend Saturday afternoons at Belchertown State School working with the mentally retarded.

--Boltwood Project--11 programs established at the Belchertown State School which will allow over 300 students to gain academic credit and career expertise while participating in community service and educating the community as to the problems of retardation.

--Juvenile Opportunity Extension-the promotion by several University students of social alternatives outside deliquency for those youth referred to the Westfield Detention Center.

--Northampton Volunteers-a group of 60-80 students who make weekly visits to the mentally ill at Northampton State Hospital.

--Northern Educational Services-individual tutoring of inner-city children by UMass students in the areas of necessary accademic skils.

Senate Treasurer Paul Hamel supported Booker, saying that the University was doing the state's job.

"A goodly number of students do work at Belchertown and Northampton State, rendering a valuable service while picking up some expertise," Hamel said.

"But I don't think it should be the role of the senate to support this. We should be budgeting activities affecting the entire campus and have the state providing more funds."

Chancellor Randolph W. Bromery said that he did not want to prejudge the Senate in its discussion of possible budget cuts, but added the University "will maintain its commitment even if the Senate withdraws its support."

"These are obviously worthwhile programs which merit our continued support," Bromery said.

"The various programs are providing UMass students with a learning vehicle while having an important impact on the community by providing special services.

"I was not aware that the student senate was talking possible budget cuts, so I don't want to take any stand before hearing all sides of the story...somebody has to pick it up (expenses)."

Associate Provost Robert L. Woodbury told the Collegian that it would be "unfortunate if the Student Senate goes backward in view of the University's progress."

"It seems to me that a number of students are involved in these activities which the University happens to support; but now the Senate wants to cut back in this area," Woodbury said.

Dr. Benjamin Ricci, a UMass professor and the president of the Belchertown State School Friends Association--a citizen advocacy group working to upgrade the conditions at Belchertown State School, says that any reduction in the funds now available will "seriously reduce the quality of the programs."

"I agree that the state should be giving more support to these programs than it has. It seems to me that students ought to be rewarded for the thankless efforts," Ricci said.

"There ought to be some kind of reimbursement. And if the state decides to do that, they legitimize the services even further."

"But no matter how you slice it, a reduction in funds is going to mean a tremendous decrease in the quality of services."

Steven Noxes, a UMass student involved in Belchertown Volunteer activities, said any forthcoming decision by the Senate to cutback on the funding of social action groups would be a "big blow to the University as well as the community."

"I think that the off-campus services programs are an important part of the college experience. With the abolishment of such programs, a valuable part of one's application to the 'real world' outside has been deprived," Noxes said.

Local 1776 election results

Drew re-elected pres; turnout good

By MICHAEL GERY
MDC Staff

Carol A. Drew was re-elected president of Employees Local 1776, AFSCME, by a resounding margin in Tuesday's elections.

"The voter turnout was decent for the type of day it was," Ms. Drew said. "I would like to thank all those who supported me." Of more than 1300 union local members, 284 cast ballots.

Local 1776 represents five of the eight units of classified workers at the University. In Tuesday's elections, officers of the units were also elected. The five units comprise workers in the areas of maintainence service, food service, farms, security and police.

Elected to Local 1776 offices were: John Ryan, vice-president; James Gafney, treasurer; Roland "Shorty" Messier, recording secretary; and Bruce Wood, sergeant-at-arms.

Local 1776 Election Results

Elected to unit posts were:

Unit No. 3, maintainence: Gerald Gillespie, chapter chairperson; John Daly, secretary; William Sieruta, chief steward; Henry Low, chief steward; Louis Duprey, campus center chief steward.

Unit No. 5, food service: Mary Turcotte, chapter chairperson; Doris Dickenson, secretary; Helen Jurewitz, chief steward.

Unit No. 6, Farms: No nominations; referred to Executive Board.

Unit No. 7, security: Eugene Lego, chapter chairperson; Leonard Grypko, chief steward.

Unit No. 8, police: No nomination referred to Executive Board.

Plans to hire an undetermined number of Spanish-speaking people as nursing assistants and a clerk-typist at Springfield Medical Center are underway.

Mr. Bill Schaare, a hospital spokesman, said, "We are hiring these people to allow for more Spanish interpretation between Spanish-speaking patients and hospital personnel."

Mr. Schaare said the number of people hired would be based on the size of the hospital's needs. The nursing assistant course, which is slated to begin in April, requires a minimum enrollment of eight people.

Mr. Jose Gonzalez, a health aide at the hospital-affiliated Brightwood-Riverview Health Center in Springfield, is supplying the personnel with the names of Spanish-speaking people who are interested in becoming nursing assistants. He said, "The nursing assistant program is still in the planning stage. If the program is a success, we hope to place the assistants in the outpatient department at the hospital."

Mr. Schaare said that while most assistants were to be placed in the outpatient department, some might assist in the outpatient department, some might assist in the emergency room or work throughout the other nursing units, when needed.

Mr. Schaare said, "While the hospital already employs one full-time Spanish-speaking clerk in the outpatient department, the personnel department is actively seeking a half-time (20 hours per week) Spanish-speaking clerk-typist to work also in the outpatient department."

On February 22, the Collegian reported that two area students, Mark Citron, a UMass pre-med student, and Douglas Whelan, a Hampshire College pre-med student, had charged that Springfield Hospital, due to a lack of Spanish-speaking personnel, "has created conditions which are preventing the Spanish-speaking community from receiving adequate medical care." They filed a report of statistics and personal observations with the U.S. Civil Rights Commission in New York City.

When asked by the Collegian if the hospital's plans to hire the clerk-typist and institute the nursing assistant program had been sparked by the students' actions, Mr. Schaare said, "Plans for hiring the half-time clerk-typist were underway before they filed their report."

He continued, "The institution of the nursing assistant program happened after they filed their report to the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. We evaluated the situation in light of the Whelan-Citron reports, although we have not yet been notified by the Commission."

Faculty Senate approves calendar

By SUSAN R. HUBBARD
MDC Staff

The Academic Calendar for the school year 1976-77 was approved at yesterday's meeting of the Faculty Senate, but not without objections being raised to the continuation of the January term and the shortened fall semester.

Another senator added that laboratory courses could probably not profit from the additional week since it would be broken up by the Labor Day holiday. The Hugus amendment was defeated.

In a final attempt to modify the calendar, it was suggested that the one reading day before exams be eliminated. This idea was also rejected and the calendar was approved in its original form.

During the announcements portion of the meeting, Senator Nick Apostola addressed the Fac-Sen on the ban on public smoking in cases where it infringed upon the rights of non-smokers.

Apostola cited an example of a classroom situation where the police had to be called to quiet an arguement between smoking and non-smoking students.

"To avoid this situation," said Apostola, "why not ask on the first day of class if there is anyone who objects to smoking."

"And there needn't be a majority of the class objecting," he added. "One objector should be enough."

In other business, the Fac-Sen approved a motion from the Rules Committee to allow the Secretary of the Fac-Sen to act as an interpreter of the faculty's primary responsibilities and obligations as outlined in the Board of Trustees' Statement on University Governance.

Also approved were student exchanges with Tunghai University and the Federal University of Cameroon.

Other topics of discussion at the meeting included the ban on public smoking, interpretation of the University Governance document, and student exchanges with foreign universities.

As proposed by the Space and Calendar Committee, the school year calendar for 76-77 would begin after Labor Day with semester exams being scheduled through Dec. 24.

Several senators objected to this late recession date and it was proposed that the exam period be shortened from eight to seven days.

This amendment to the motion was defeated when the Fac-Sen was reminded that they themselves had approved the eight day testing period.

In another amendment offered by Senator Frank R. Hugus, it was proposed that the first day of registration by Aug. 30, placing another five days of classes at the beginning of the fall semester.

It was Hugus' contention that an "imbalance of classes is caused by the 13 week fall calendar as opposed to the 14 week spring semester calendar."

However, Senator Howard Gadlin said, "This could cause a conflict for students who must work during the summer up to or through Labor Day."

Courts knocked

Governors' Councellor and announced candidate for Massachusetts Attorney General Edward M. O'Brien of Easthampton yesterday advocated the abolition of the grand jury system of indictments at a UMass appearance.

Speaking at a political campaigns seminar in Project Ten in Southwest he called for a general reexamination of the criminal justice system and a commission to review furloughs of state prisoners.

"The accused does not have the right to bring in his own witnesses," O'Brien said. "There seems to be a reactionary outcry on the part of a lot of our citizens to do away with the furlough system," he added.

He said more attention should be paid to the District Court system, instead of grand juries. Asked about the death penalty for specific murder cases, now under consideration in both the state legislature and the Congress, O'Brien said it is "some kind of deterrent."

"I favor the imposition of the death penalty in limited situations." he said. O'Brien also said he opposes abortion "because the viability of the fetus does have rights of its own," and also said he doesn't favor the legalization of marijuana "until there is some kind of firm investigation that shows there are no lasting effects."

"There seems to be a reactionary outcry on the part of alot of our citizens to do away with the furlough system," he said. O'Brien feel that instead of doing away with this system, a furlough commission should be established, consisting of representatives from:

--the department of Corrections
--the Department of Health
--the Attorney General's office.

Convicted W'gate burglars plead innocent

WASHINGTON (AP) — Three of the convicted Watergate burglars were reunited in a federal courtroom yesterday as they pleaded innocent to a conspiracy charge in the Ellsberg break-in case.

G. Gordon Liddy, Eugenie R. Martinez and Bernard L. Barker shook hands and clapped each other on the back as they met.

Liddy also embraced a fourth Ellsberg case defendant, Felipe DeDiego, who like Barker and Martinez is a member of the Cuban-American community in Miami. DeDiego also pleaded innocent.

The four are charged, along with former White House assistants John D. Ehrlichman and Charles W. Colson, with conspiracy to violate the rights of Dr. Lewis Fielding, the Beverly Hills psychiatrist who had been treating Pentagon Papers figure Daniel Ellsberg.

Henry B. Rothblatt, counsel for DeDiego, a Miami real estate broker, told newsmen he expects to subpeona President Nixon as a defense witness.

"Every relevant witness will be called," Rothblatt said. "I think he'll be a very relevant witness."

Other defense sources have hinted they will call virtually everyone in a current or former official capacity who has been connected with the socalled Plumbers operation, which was designed to stop national security leaks. Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger has been mentioned as a potential witness.

Ehrlichman and Colson, defendants also in the Watergate cover-up indictment, pleaded innocent in the Ellsberg case last Saturday as they were arraigned on the other charges.

Liddy led the parade of "not guilty" responses when the court clerk said: "In criminal number 74-116 in which the grand jury charges you with conspiracy against rights of citizens, I hand you a copy of the indictment, how do you plead?"

After the session, Liddy was led to another courtroom for arraignment on another charge: that he committed contempt of Congress by refusing to testify. There, too, he pleaded not guilty.

The six defendants in the Ellsberg case represent an intertwining of Watergate and the so-called Plumbers operation. Through the Plumbers, the White House sought information on Ellsberg, then under indictment for stealing and leaking the Pentagon Papers study of the origins of the Vietnam war.

According to the latest indictment, Liddy and E. Howard Hunt, who was named an unindicted co-conspirator, were authorized by Ehrlichman and paid by Colson to undertake a "covert operation" to get Ellsberg's psychiatric files. Egil Krogh Jr., who has pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge and is serving a six-months sentence, was in charge of the group.

U.S. and the world

Vesco threatened 'to blow the lid off'

NEW YORK (AP) — At the height of a cover-up of Robert L. Vesco's secret $200,000 contribution to President Nixon's 1972 campaign, the financier himself threatened "to blow the lid off the whole thing," a government witness testified Thursday.

This testimony came from Laurence Richardson at the criminal conspiracy trial of former Atty. Gen. John N. Mitchell and onetime Commerce Secretary Maurice H. Stands.

Vesco had just been subpoenaed by Securities and Exchange Commission fraud investigators and Richardson, his associate at the time, testified:

"Vesco said that was outrageous and complained that they were trying to set him up for perjury, they were trying to extend the investigation into areas where they hadn't been before, they were trying to trace down the contribution, he wanted it quashed.

"Mr. Vesco said to Harry Sears, 'Get hold of Mitchell and those guys and tell them to have that subpoena quashed, or I'll blow the lid off the whole thing.'

"He was extremely agitated and emotional. I've never seen him so mad. Sears said, all right, he'd see what he could do. Then he walked out. He was angry too."

Q. Did he say who "those guys" were.

A. No.

The subpoena went unquashed and when Vesco appeared before the commission on Oct. 18, 1972, he took the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination. Sears, who left New Jersey Republican politics to become a $60,000-a-year legal adviser to Vesco, was the latter's advocate with Stans and Mitchell, whom he had known as a result of his own activities in his home state.

In cross-examination, Richardson denied he had made any deal to escape indictment in the case by testifying for the prosecution against Mitchell and Stans.

He also denied he had a fix of the SEC investigation in mind when he and Vesco first approached Stans with the offer of a $200,000 contribution and that he did not consider himself a bagman when he turned the money over to the former commerce secretary later.

The trial resumes at 9:45 a.m. Friday in a larger courtroom, which became vacant earlier this week. It is expected to accommodate the current overflow of spectators.

Mitchell and Stans are accused of trying to derail the SEC investigation in return for the six-figure Vesco campaign contribution. The money changed hands secretly three days after the effectiveness of a new law requiring that such contributions be made public.

Richardson's testimony was intended to bolster and flesh out Sear's recital during the latter's seven days on the witness stand, ending Wednesday. Sears was a key government witness since, by his account, he was in on the arrangements for the $200,000 campaign contribution, was present when the money was exchanged, and took part in the cover-up that followed.

Richardson, 51, formerly was president of the International Controls Corp., cornerstone of Vesco's multibillion-dollar international financial empire. An apparently relaxed witness, he smiled easily and often, both under direct and cross-examination.

Other testimony related to the then-chairman of the SEC, William Casey. Richardson said: "Mr. Sears reported to Mr. Vesco that he had gotten a message from Mr. Mitchell that Mr. Casey was extremely irritated at all the pressure being put on him from other sources in addition to Mr. Mitchell.

Schultz resigns

urging of President Nixon until it was felt the time was right.

Aides said the secretary did not want to look as if he were deserting the President in a time of need.

He made clear to newsmen Thursday he was resigning because he was tired after five pressure-packed years. He said he was disturbed by the Watergate scandal but had words of praise for the President.

Shultz said Nixon "has always been available for counsel and always supported me, and I appreciate that very much."

One of the greatest achievements during his term as secretary, Shultz said, was the new system of floating world currency exchange rates, which he said has worked well.

On the minus side, he said, was the country's inflation rate which caused consumer prices to increase 8.8 per cent last year, the highest rate of inflation since 1947.

As for lessons learned he said, "the U.S. economy is part of the world economy-that's the big lesson of 1973."

Shultz said he has not decided what he will do after he resigns, but indicated he might return to the University of Chicago where he was dean of Graduate School of Business before joining the Nixon administration.

Before stepping down as secretary, Shultz will travel to Santiago, Chile for a meeting of the Inter-American Development Bank April 1 and 2 and to Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia for a meeting of the Asian Development Bank April 24 to 27.

Israel clashes with Syria; record defense budget set

By THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Israeli and Syrian gunners waged a long-distance artillery duel across the Golan cease-fire line for the third straight day yesterday as Israel's government announced a record $8.4 billion budget to help pay the bills of the October war.

The United Nations Emergency Force announced it was doubling its force to 4,000 men in the Sinai buffer zone between the Egyptian and Israeli armies, but denied the move had anything to do with the tense situation on the Golan Heights.

Tripoli radio reported that Syria opposed lifting the Arab oil embargo against the United States and accused governments which proposed this of treachery. It was the first official account of what went on at a meeting of Arab oil ministers Wednesday in Tripoli.

High-level Libyan sources said after the meeting that the participants had decided to lift the ban. But Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger said in Washington he had received no word on whether the Arabs intended to lift it. Vice President Gerald R. Ford said earlier he understood the embargo had been lifted.

The Tel Aviv command said fighting flared briefly on the front where Israel captured 300 square miles of territory in the war.

Syrian cannon opened fire in three zones, a command communique said, and the Israelis returned the fire. The Syrians said they destroyed two Israeli tanks and an ammunition dump and unspecified number of Israeli casualities. The Tel Aviv command said the Israelis suffered three wounded.

The shelling on the Golan Heights appeared to be a minor incident on the front, where Premier Golda Meir claims the Syrians were planning an offensive before truce talks were arranged in Washington by Kissinger.

Mrs. Meir and Defense Minister Moshe Dayan were in parliament as the shelling was announced, listening to Finance Minister Pinhas Sapir outline a draft budget setting aside $3.4 billion to buy arms, build fortifications and manufacture new weapons in Israel's own factories.

Sapir said the defense account came nowhere near paying for the October was and warned that Israel would have to spend "many billions of dollars" for the next few years to match the flow of Soviet arms to the Arab states.

Israel's economy emerged from the war battered but intact, Sapir said, while the Arabs had "legendary incomes from oil, no financial problems" and stupendous arsenals of weapons from Moscow.

Israeli expenses in foreign currency alone for arms and raw war material "will far exceed the entire amount afforded us in aid by the United States," Sapir told parliament. He said he hoped that most of Washington's $2.2 billion in aid would not have to be repaid, and that relying on American assistance would not lead to American pressure on Israel.

The war against Egypt and Syria cost Israel $7.14 billion in budgetary and economic terms, Sapir said.

The total government expense account for the fiscal year starting April 1 was almost double last year's original budget. Just after the Oct. 24 cease-fire, however, Sapir threw ordinary bookkeeping into the waste basket and raised the 1973 estimates to within $700 million of the record new figure.

Ransom payed; U.S. oil man still held

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina (AP) — American oilman Victor Samuelson remained in the hands of his Marxist captors yesterday despite payment of a record $14.2 million ransom.

Esse Argentina officials were optimistic the 36-year-old refinery manager would be released shortly even though reluctant editors prevented full compliance with the guerrillas's demand for publicity.

Samuelson was kidnaped Dec. 6 and held in a small "people's jail" during the long negotiations between Esso and the People's Revolutionary Army — ERP — an outlawed terrorist group.

The ransom was finally paid Monday, 142,000 $100 bills carried to a rendezvous in the trunk of a car, informed sources said.

The ERP set a further condition that Esso place advertisements in a dozen Buenos Aires newspapers saying the ransom was part of "superearnings obtained in Argentina through exploitation of workers."

Only two morning papers carried the ad yesterday. An afternoon daily, El Mundo, ran the text in a news story Wednesday afternoon.

The government banned El Mundo from publishing Thursday, saying it had broken the law preventing the spread of guerrilla propaganda.

The agreement came after bargaining broke down and the ERP sent Esso a letter saying they would shoot Samuelson and return his body in an American flag, qualified sources said.

According to an account in the Buenos Aires Herald, guerrillas told some local newsmen they were impressed as Samuelson calmly prayed as he was taken from his cell and told he would be executed.

Informed sources gave this account of the bargaining from the date of Samuelson's captured in the restaurant of the refinery he managed in Campana, 60 miles north of Buenos Aires:

—The ERP demanded $10million worth of food, clothing, medical supplies and building materials to be distributed to Argentina's needy.

—Esso argued it could not meet with the complicated distribution plan and could only pay cash. Officials said they could not pay more than $7 million, and they said if the offer wasn't accepted, they would release all information they had on the ERP to the police.

—The ERP countered by sticking with their demand for $10 million, agreeing to accept cash, and they added that Esso must spend $4.2 million for flood relief in northern Argentina.

—Esso, apparently after high-level consultations with Exxon in New York late in February, agreed to pay $14.2 million in cash.

Samuelson's wife and three children were evacuated from Argentina in mid-January when officials said the negotiations for his release were at a stalemate. Samuelson is a native of Cleveland, Ohio and had lived in several Latin-American countries working for Esso before coming here three years ago.

Plane crashes in California; 31 TV-film employees die

BISHOP, Calif. (AP) — Investigators flew by helicopter yesterday to a rocky ridge where a chartered plane crashed and exploded, killing 31 members of a television movie crew and five airline employes.

Eyewitnesses said the Sierra Pacific plane blew up like a fireball after slamming into the ridge about five minutes after takeoff from Bishop Airport Wednesday night. The twin-engine propeller plane disintegrated on impact. Only the tail section remained intact.

A helicopter pilot at the site said: "They were all dead. All that we saw was a lot of burning."

Wolper Productions, which chartered the Convair 440 for the crew filming the documentary series "The Primal Man," said one of the dead was actor James Prohaska, 54. He played the talking bear on the Andy Williams Television show. His son Robert, 34, also was identified as a victim.

The crew, which had been working in the area since Monday, was headed for Burbank, a Los Angeles suburb about 250 miles south of here.

Federal Aviation Authority officials, Inyo County coroner's workers and an FBI team were at the scene. The FBI men were assisting in identification of the bodies, many of which were badly burned.

Cause of the crash was not im-portrayed in television specials. They played prehistoric men in the four-part ABC documentary about man's struggle for survival.

Wolper Productions spokesman Michael Manheim said another victim was Dennis Azzarella, a film director and writer whose credits include the National Geographic special, "The Violent Earth," and a television biography of football star Joe Namath.

In Los Angeles, Sierra Pacific spokesman Dean Sparkman said the pilot had been in contact with the control tower at Bishop Airport until just before the crash and had reported no difficulties.

Sierra Pacific is a subsidiary of Mammoth Mountain Corp., which operates ski lifts near Mammoth Lakes, about 50 miles north of here. It purchased four 44-passenger Convairs last year.

Russians land module on Mars

MOSCOW (AP) - Russia's Mars 6 space shot has landed a module on the surface of the red planet and transmitted data collected during the descent through the Martian atmosphere, Tass reported today.

The official Soviet news agency said Mars 6, which was launched last Aug. 5, reached the vicinity of Mars on Tuesday and sent the module to the surface the same day.

Mars 7, which was launched Aug. 9, reached the vicinity of the planet a week ago, Tass said. It did not say what it has done since then, but Western experts had speculated in advance that one of the spaceships would orbit the planet to serve as a communications relay station while the other sent a capsule to the surface.

Tass said Mars 6 sent data "on parameters of the martian atmosphere, obtained through direct measurements during the descent of the apparatus."

The Soviet Union first landed a space probe on Mars on Dec. 2, 1971. This was the Mars 3 shot. Mars 1, launched in 1962, was lost in space and Mars 2, launched May 19, 1971, circled the planet and transmitted photos to earth.

Mars 4 and 5 were launched last July, just a few weeks ahead of 6 and 7. Tass has reported that Mars 4 failed to function properly, while Mars 5 went into orbit around the planet and became a satellite.

Sawhill cautions

Arab oil will not end shortages

WASHINGTON (AP) - Ending the Arab oil embargo could increase U.S. gasoline supplies almost immediately, but the price will remain high, John Sawhill, deputy administrator of the Federal Energy Office said yesterday.

Both Sawhill and federal energy chief William E. Simon cautioned that when the Arab oil embargo ends, fuel shortages will continue.

"The shortages will be manageable, but the problems are going to be with us for a very long time," Simon said.

Both the White House and the State Department said they had received no word yet of any end to the embargo.

Earlier, Vice President Gerald R. Ford said he understood the embargo had been lifted.

Testifying before the consumer subcommittee of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, Sawhill said that even if the embargo remains in effect, gasoline lines should be shorter in April.

He said it now appears no gasoline rationing will be needed before June, if then. He also said that FEO is prepared to lift its regulation under which service stations in many areas have limited motorists to a $3 or $4 purchase of gasoline. But the rule barring drivers from filling up while their tanks are at least half full should continue, he added.

"We will probably never see gasoline prices return to their pre-embargo levels," Sawhill said. "I wouldn't look for any dramatic price reduction."

He later said he expects gasoline prices to peak at near current levels, which on a national average would mean about 52 cents per gallon. That is eight or nine cents higher than a year ago.

Assuming the embargo is lifted seen, the United States could expect an oil shortage of 2 or 3 per cent in the second quarter, he said. That figure would rise to 12 to 14 per cent if the embargo continues, Sawhill added.

Simon, speaking before the Republican Women's Federal Forum, predicted that the fuel shortfall after the embargo ends would range from 1 to 5 per cent, with the final amount depending on prices, demand and conservation measures.

He stressed the need for continued conservation, calling attention to annual increases in energy demand of 4 to 5 per cent over the past 20 years. He said the United States Could deal with annual increases of 3 per cent for the rest of the decade.

In related developments: -U.S. District Court Judge Barrington Parker, in Washington, upheld FEO regulations that require oil companies to sell part of their crude oil to other refiners. He also turned aside a challenge to FEO regulations that require refiners to continue supplying the companies they supplied in 1972. Gulf Oil Corp. had challenged the regulations, saying they were arbitrary and capricious.

-Consumer advocate Ralph Nader Urged that energy saving measures such as lower highway speeds and car pooling be continued after the lifting of the embargo.

The energy crisis

Syrian opposition not likely to prevent end of embargo

TRIPOLI, Libya (AP) - The Libyan radio said yesterday Syria charged at the oil meeting here that Arab nations supporting the lifting of the oil embargo against the United States were treacherous.

"Syria, for its part, considers the ending of the embargo against the United States as surrender on the part of the Arabs and treachery toward the Arab cause and the Palestinian problem, especially since the United States until now has not defined its attitude toward the Arabs," the broadcast said.

The Arab oil ministers left Tripoli after reportedly deciding Wednesday night to lift the ban. There was no immediate sign that the Syrian stand would interfere with the decision.

The broadcast also said Algeria held out at the meeting for setting a two-month trial period on lifting the embargo.

Giving the first official account of Wednesday's meeting of Arab oil ministers in a Tripoli hotel, the radio made no mention of the reported decision to lift the oil ban imposed during the October Mideast war.

Libya has strongly opposed easing the oil curb, and the lack of an official announcement that the meeting had decided otherwise was to avoid embarrasment for Col. Meanmar Khadafy, the Libyan leader and host for the meeting.

New England dealers increase gas sales

BOSTON (AP) - Motorists are finding gasoline much easier to get at service stations throughout New England, according to a survey released yesterday by the American Automobile Association.

The survey said many stations have extended their hours of pumping gas.

In Massachusetts, more than 50 per cent of the stations surveyed are now pumping gasoline all day, compared with 15 per cent reported two weeks ago, AAA said.

About 50 per cent of the stations surveyed in New Hampshire, Vermont and Maine also now are pumping gasoline all day during the week, the survey said.

In Connecticut, the figure is about 40 percent.

Harrington objects NE power rate hike

BOSTON (AP) - Rep. Michael J. Harrington said yesterday he was petitioning the Federal Power Commission to reject a $39 million rate increase requested by New England Power Co.

Harrington, D-Mass., accused New England Power and its retail affiliate, Massachusetts Electric, with a "blitzkrieg approach to extracting more money from its customers."

"This latest in a series of rate increase requests seems to reflect the New England Power Co.'s belief that if it floods the regulatory agencies, both federal and state, with enough rate filings, it it bound to win something in return regardless of the merits of each specific request," Harrington said.

A spokesman for the New England Electric System, the holding company that owns New England Power and Massachusetts Electric, said the utility needs the rate increase so that it can expand to meet future needs.

"If we are to continue to provide power and qulity service, it is vital that we get this rate increase," the spokesman said Friday.

Harrington said that in January, New England Power was granted a $12 million rate increase. A second rate increase request the same noth was denied, he said.

"In addition, Massachusetts Electric has won a $7.3 million rate boost on its own from the state Department of Public Utilities in the last year," Harrington said. "This company is now asking in a highly publicized proceeding for a rate surcharge which would penalize its customers millions of additional dollars."

Harrington said the rate increase would affect nearly 700,000 customers of Massachusetts Electric, as well as 27 communities that purchase wholesale electricity from New England Power.

Shell Oil explosion blamed on group

SAN RAMON, Calif. (AP) - A telephone caller saying he was part of a group seeking to lower gasoline prices claimed responsibility today for a small explosion at a Shell Oil Co. operation.

The blast, the third such explosion in a week, occurred early today at Shell Chemical Co.'s Agricultural Division here.

It caused "minimal" damage to a shed, Contra Costa County Sheriff's officers said. No one was injured.

Deputies said a pipe bomb found after the first explosion was disarmed by a naval demolition team.

As in the two previous bombings, a caller said the blast was caused by "Americans for Justice." The caller telephoned the San Francisco Chronicle shortly before the blast. The caller also directed newsmen to a telephone booth where they found a list of demands.

Also as before, the caller called for a rollback in gasoline prices and free distribution of gas to the elderly.

The FBI said it doesn't know anything about "Americans for Justice."

SOCIAL ECOLOGY STUDIES PROGRAM

GODDARD COLLEGE SUMMER '74

June 3-August 23 15 credits

An intensive 12 week program in social ecology and environmental sciences, exploring alternative technologies, a no-growth economy, organic agriculture, urban decentralization, the politics of ecology, and the design and construction of experimental models for wind, solar, and methane-powered energy production.

Goddard is located in a rural Vermont community, rich in both natural and human resources, in a state noted for its progressive environmental legislation.

The summer program is directed by MURRAY BOOKCHIN, author of Post-Scarcity Anarchism and Limits to the City. Faculty include KARL HESS, Community Technologies; SAM LOVE, the Environmental Action Collective; JOHN TODD and the New Alchemists; WILSON CLARK, energy consultant.

Linear Sound — Now $30 Less.

"Linear Sound" is sound with equal intensity throughout the musical range. A loudspeaker with linear sound reproduces bass notes as loudly as it does the treble or mid range. The sound of EPI 90's is so lenear and natural that the speaker almost disappears . . . leaving only the music. (The EPI 90 is identical acoustically to the top rated EPI 100, only in a vinyl clad cabinet for $30 less per pair). As a suitable power source for the EPI's we've chosen the Nikko 4020 FM stereo receiver with 34 watts of power (R.M.S.) this unit features FM interstation muting and out puts for two sets of speakers. The dependable Glenburn 2130 turntable has a light weight aluminum tone-arm, viscous damped cueing and includes a Shure M75EC eliptical magnetic cartridge, dust cover and base. Support medical school

To The Editor:

The incoming freshman class of 1974 at the University of Massachusetts Medical School is supposed to have an enrollment of 64 students, an enlargement of the class from the previous year. However, the possibility exists that the size of the class will be decreased instead of increased. Why? It is not lack of facilities, which would seem the obvious reason. It is lack of funds. Yes, after spending many millions of dollars on building of the medical school and hiring competent staff, the medical school might just become a dust collector. Economically speaking, there just does not seem to be enough money to expand the class. But how economical is it for these facilities to be used by only 40 students, when they have the potential for 100 students.

The logistics of having a state medical school need also to be examined. One function of the state medical school is to afford students an excellent medical education at a low cost. A medical education at a private institution can now run as high as eight or nine thousand dollars per year when all expenses are tolled. At a time when health loans are at a premium, this cost would seem almost impossible for a middle or lower income family to absorb.

Another reason for the state medical school existing became obvious to me after attending interviews at private institutions. It seems that so called "private institutions" feel the education at public universities, like University of Massachusetts, cannot compare to their schools. My education at University of Massachusetts has been nothing short of excellent. But seeing this downcast look with which private institutions view University of Massachusetts' undergraduates, I feel that the state medical school has an obligation to accept many students from its own undergraduate institution.

In conclusion, the possibility exists that funds for University of Massachusetts Medical School will be severely cut limiting the growth of next year's freshman class. As a possible medical student next year, I feel the opportunity for me and other students to attend medical school may be hampered by this reduction. For whatever the reason, this cutback is wrong. If you agree with the above philosophy, please contact your state representative.

May strike

To The Editor:

The members of Local Union No. 1199 of Hospital Workers and Health Care Employees for several weeks now have been negotiating a new contract with the Amherst Nursing Home. One of the main points of contention is the question of what constitutes a living wage. The administration is offering $2.10 per hour as a starting salary with no provisional cost-of-living increases. This is 10 cents per hour more than the starting pay provided by the contract due to expire on March 14. The Union, meanwhile, feels strongly that in view of the current economic situation, $2.50 is not an unreasonable demand. Negotiations for the administration have stated that the Nursing Home is financially able to meet this demand but is "unwilling" to do so.

Many of the Union members are either University students, former students, or students' wives. Accordingly, the administration has further said that the University community can supply the Home with replacements for dissatisfied employees. Should the negotiations result in a strike of Union workers, we urge University students, with less than nine weeks until summer vacation, to not cross picket lines to apply for these jobs.

Obviously, the real victims of this conflict are the patients at the Nursing Home and their families who must pay inflationary rates for nursing services, and yet to be inconvenienced by what is clearly an administrative problem. The priority of their interests, we feel, makes this more than a wage dispute. The question then is; how realistically can those who cannot recognize the needs of their young and able employees be expected to deal with the needs of the aged and the chronically ill?

We would also like to thank the Valley Women's Center for the support which they have offered us in this matter.

Waiting at the Health Center

To The Editor:

Last week I made an appointment on the phone with the Health Center, a practice I do not normally follow because in the past 2½ years only 2 of the 12 so-called appointments I made with Health Center personnel have been kept (to the time and the hour). In the mail a card arrives that reads as follow: "This is to remind you that you have a doctor appointment with Dr. —— on Mar 06, 1974 at 01:00 p.m. If you cannot make the appointment or if you have any questions please call 549-2600." The rest is of little importance. I am surprised that something like "This is no guarantee that the doctor will make the appointment" is not on the card!

To cut a long story short, I made my way to the Health Center on Monday March 4th to inform the Appointment Desk that I'd rather be told within 5 minutes of the appointment time (01:00 p.m.) if the doctor will keep the appointment — needless to say, this was refused.

Anyway, today March 6th I went and signed in, and promptly at 1 p.m. was taken up and asked to sit on a chair. I saw the doctor walk in around 1:20 p.m. Another 'Third World' student walked in with the doctor into the clinic. I was seen by the doctor at 1:29 p.m. My visit was brief; 37 seconds, plus minus five seconds. (Unless otherwise mentioned, all times herein are according to the clocks in the Health Center.)

Needless to say there was no reference by the doctor to the delay in seeing me, no apologies were tendered. Needless also to say, none were expected.

Now my question is this: I have been in the Health Advisory Board enough to know that sometime in 1972-73 such incidences were brought up in the H.A.B. meeting, and it was recommended that where appointments have been made by students, it would be not improper, and considerate, to expect the nurse in charge to inform the waiting student-patient within a few minutes of the appointment time that the doctor would be late, and would the student prefer to wait or make an appointment for a later date, etc...It is hereby evident that such a practice is not being followed. Or, are such recommendations made only for the meeting, to be discarded thereafter? Who knows?!

I really do not expect a reply. No rebuttal, please. I do not want to make an issue of it, nor expand it into a paper-consuming contest. At least now you know why I do not make appointments with a record of 2 out of 13, who will? Because you see, an appointment is a two-way agreement, not a one-way. I believe the latter is, otherwise, known as exploitation — something not unfamiliar to us from the "Third World". Or am I from the "Fourth", "Fifth" or "Sixth World". In peace, respectfully.

Nixon won't give up

To The Editor:

I cannot help but admire the confidence that Fred Weiss displays in announcing that the resignation of the President is all but a certainty. However, I would go on to say that this confidence--no matter how exuberant--is unfounded. In short, I think that we are unfortunately stuck with Mr. Nixon until 1976.

In arriving at this opinion, we first have to examine the "nature of the beast." We must realize that Richard Nixon has spent almost all of his adult life trying to be President. He was Vice-President of this country over 20 years ago. He was upset by JFK in 1960, embarrassed in his home state in 1962, and finally reached his goal in 1968. Having at long last found his destiny, Nixon will not easily give it up.

Since his elevation to the Presidency, Mr. Nixon has been under constant attack and has deservedly taken more criticism than any President in our history--and he still shows no sign of relinquishing the reins of power. Destruction of his party, loss of his mandate, nor the shattering of his personal esteem will budget the President. He has pulled out all stops to avoid impeachment, no matter whom it destroys. It goes without saying that he will continue to do so.

President Nixon has said on many occasions that stepping down would be the "easy way out." We are all painfully aware that Dick Nixon never takes the easy way out.

Wants to forget it

To The Editor:

Hopefully, this will be the last letter I write to the Editor about a $5 registration fee and the Everywoman's Center. My letter in Wednesday's paper was written a week ago and the same day that letter was put in the paper, I received a letter from the co-ordinator of Project Self apologizing for the misunderstanding and stating that I would receive a check for $5 in the mail. I don't have to say how embarrassed I was reading my own letter in the Collegian in which I said that it was the Everywoman's Center that should be sending the $5, when right in front of me was a letter saying that the Everywoman's Center WAS sending the $5.

So the purpose of this letter is not only to tell those interested that the Everywoman's Center is sending me back my $5, but also to apologize to the Center for the whole misunderstanding. I'm sorry if I caused you any embarrassment or bad feelings. I realize that the Everywoman's Center is just a group of concerned women existing to help other concerned women and to educate anyone who wants to learn about the plight of and discrimination against women and how to deal with it. I hope I didn't damage you in any way. My objection was purely monetary and it has been resolved. Let us forget our misunderstanding and 'let bygones be bygones.'

I know the Center feels the same way, for I talked with the co-ordinator of Project Self and we agree that it was a shame this ever happened and agreed to forget about it.

Believers and followers

To The Editor:

Re: Barbara Voorhes Column March 14

In response to your column yesterday entitled, "Religion Unfashionable", we would like to say that we agree. Religion by itself is empty. Man can not and will not ever reach God by following any man set of rules or code of ethics. Certainly history has proven this to be correct.

This is the reason why you have heard no more about Josh. He has no followers just fellow believers. We, the Christians on campus, do not follow the teachings of any man. Josh was proclaiming Jesus Christ and He, Jesus, is the One in whom our trust and faith is based. Christ is not unfashionable or out of style. He is just as much alive and working today as He ever has been.

We personally invite you to come tonight and every Friday night to the Colonial Lounge at 7:00 to meet people whose hearts are filled with the love of Christ.

UMass needs a Vet school

To The Editor:

On Monday, March 11, 1974, there was a front page article in the Daily Collegian stating the need for a public law school in Massachusetts.

Establishing a law school in Amherst would make a total of six in Massachusetts. The need for a law school does not surpass the dire and immediate need for a school of veterinary medicine.

First of all, there's not even one Veterninary College in New England, let along Massachusetts.

Many articles in the news have spoken of a surplus of lawyers, while by the year 1980 New England faces a critical shortage of over 1,200 veterinarians.

"Three hundred to five hundred students who are accepted into Mass Law School never go because of insufficient funds," while about 94 per cent of all pre-vet students never get accepted merely because of their residency. There simply isn't room for them in out-of-state Veterinary schools.

Numerous recent articles stating the impootance of veterinarians in our lives should not go unnoticed. They are directly and indirectly responsible for our food, immediate health, and medical research.

..If the UMass officials would look more deeply into the situation, I'm sure they would change their priorities.

IPO needs funding

To The Editor:

The Executive Committee of UCF wishes to share with David Booker, Speaker UMass Student Senate our concern for the continued and adequate funding of the work of the International Program Office. We support the viewpoint set forth by Barbara Burn in her Feb. 28 letter to the Collegian. Curtailment of scholarship aid, emergency loans, travel assistance, and seed money for international fairs would be an impoverishment of the total life of the campus. At a time when idsillusionment with American involvement overseas is turning our attention toward private pursuits, the opportunity to be personally touched by the richness of other cultures must be seen as integral to our educational process and not merely as a luxury.

Sincerely,
UCF EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

NIT smokers beware

Let me make this clear right from the beginning. I AM NOT WRITING THIS TO PERSUADE ANYONE'S MORALS NOR AM I WRITING THIS ADVOCATING ANY POSITION!

The NIT is this weekend. So is St. Patty's Day. Now you and I both know that a lot of us UMies will be going to Fun City for the weekend, myself included. While I am not a drug user, there are a lot of UMies who are. I feel I can correctly assume that the UMies going to New York are going to party, a lot. And I know that UMies are heavy on grass. This, I feel is objective information. I'm not arguing anybody on any merits. That's not the reason for this.

The reason is that on September 1, 1973, a new drug law was passed in New York State and it's a lot tougher than the laws of Massachusetts. What I am doing is to just spell out what will happen to you if you get caught. That's all.

A misdemeanor is the unlawful possession of any amount of any controlled substance. The maximum penalty is 1 year's imprisonment and probation is available.

A Class D felony is either the unlawful sale of any amount of any controlled substance or possession with intent to sell such. Also, possessing ½ ounce to 2 ounces of any narcotic preparations falls in this category. The possession of ¼ to one ounce or 25-100 marijuana cigarettes also is a Class C felony. For the first marijuana violation, probation is available but all other Class C felony convictions call for an imprisonment of 1-7 years.

A Class C felony involves the following: unlawful sale of any amount of any narcotic preparation, dangerous depressants, or marijuana. It also includes the unlawful possession of ⅛ to 1 ounce of any narcotic drug, ½ to 2 ounces of methamphetamine, 1 to 5 grams of stimulants, 1 to 5 milligrams of LSD, 25 to 125 milligrams of other hallucinogens, 1 to 5 grams of hallucinogenic substances, 2 or more ounces of narcotic depressants, 10 or more ounces of dangerous depressants, or 1 ounce of 100 cigarettes or more of marijuana. The Penalty is 1 to 15 years imprisonment. A jail term is mandatory except for marijuana, where probation is available for the first violation.

A Class B felony involves a second offender of a C felony in both unlawful possession and unlawful sale. It also includes the unlawful sale of any amount of any narcotic preparation to someone under 21 years of age. The penalty is 1 to 15 years imprisonment.

A Class A-III felony involves a second offender of possession of any amount of any hallucinogens, hallucinogenic substances, LSD, Methamphetamine or stimulants with intent to sell. It also includes a second offender who sells any amount of any narcotic drug, methamphetamine, stimulants, LSD, hallucinogens and hallucinogenic substances. Also, a first offender selling ⅛ to ½ ounce of any narcotic drug, 1 to 5 grams of methamphetamine, 1-5 milligrams of LSD or stimulants, 25-125 milligrams of hallucinogens or 1-5 grams of hallucinogenic substances. It also involves possession with intent to sell any amount of any narcotic drug, 25 milligrams of hallucinogens, 1 gram of hallucinogenic substances, 1 mg. of LSD, ⅛ oz. of methamphetamine or 1 gram of stimulants. Possession of 5-10 grams of stimulants, 5-25 milligrams of LSD, 125-625 milligrams of hallucinogens, or 5-25 grams of hallucinogenic substances is also a Class A-III felony. The penalty for these is a 1 year to life imprisonment.

A Class A-II felony involves the unlawful sale of ⅛ to once ounce of any narcotic drug, methamphetamine, stimulants, LSD, hallucinogens or hallucinogenic substances. The possession of 1-2 ounces of any narcotic drug, 2 or more ounces of methamphetamine, 10 or more grams of stimulants, 25 or more milligrams of LSD, 625 or more milligrams of hallucinogens or over 25 grams of hallucinogenic substances are also classified here. The penalty is 6 years to life.

Now, we have the Class A-1 felony. This is the sale of 1 ounce or more of any narcotic drug or the possession of 2 ounces or more of same. The penalty is 15 years to life imprisonment.

Basically, all I've tried to do is lay down this law for you as it is. If anyone has any questions about it, the people of Room-to-Move have a copy of this law. See them, or, if you do get in trouble, see Dick Howland. I hope that no UMie gets a drug bust down in New York. I've just listed the law to show you what it is and what the consequences are if you get caught.

Russia vs. China

Remember the Fabulous Fifties? Ask your history professor to give you some PHDed nootalgia, and he's bound to give you a long rendition about the fear, hysteria, paranoia, witchunts, McCarthyism, Dullesism, etc. He'll even tell you about the horrible apprehensions America had about Red China. Did you know that high-level American policy-makers used to refer to the Communist Chinese as the "Yellow Peril?"

How we've grown up since those days. They used to talk about how those Chinese were rapidly multiplying themselves into World Predominance, and as soon as they got the Bomb, watch out! So we decided that we could "no longer ignore 800 million of them."

But there's still a lunatic fringe, ever fearful and vigilant against the menace on the Eastern horizons. They still worry about the every-increasing size of the Chinese population, and of the imminent danger of being overrun by endless swarms of Mini-Mao's. No, the lunatic fringe isn't in America. The Americans, at least those who see things pragmatically, see in China a potential market of 800 million-plus consumers of Coca-Cola, Levi's, Pampers, IBM computers, and maybe even Colonel Sander's. No, the fearful watchers aren't huddling in the Pentagon.

So where are all of those paranoid China-haters? In Moscow, that's where. Talk to Chairman Brezhnev and General Grechko about "American Imperialism and Capitalist Encirclement." and they will laugh all the way to this week's champagne and caviar banquet with David Rockefeller. But talk to them about the teeming masses of communists in China, and they'll probably break out in a cold sweat.

The Russian tacticians used to plan strategy for the inevitable overthrow of capitalism in the bourgeios West. Now they're busy enticing huge corporations to invest in the development of their "booming" economy. But with all of the rush to negotiate with the Americans, the Soviets are secretly and frantically building up their military capacity and nuclear arsenals. They're not in the least bit worried about a confrontation with the West. Their Inter-Continental Ballistic Missiles aren't being multi-warheaded for combat against the United States. They're aiming for Peking.

The Soviets have had this pathological fear of China for many years. They have been mobilizing their vast military reserves on the far Eastern front at an unbelievable rate. Ever since the middle sixties, when China first tested a nuclear weapon, the Russians have been preparing for the day of judgement, when the mongol hordes from the East would come swooping down over the steppes and lay waste to Mother Russia. In 1969, the Russians secretly sent a courier to President Nixon, furtively imploring him to join in a pre-emptive nuclear strike against Chinese missile installations. They were hoping that Nixon would commit American power in a venture to "knock those Yellow Devils out of the ring before they get too strong themselves." Nixon, who during his own Vice-Presidency had warned against the impending threat from the Reds in the Far East, gave the Russians a very blunt "no-thank-you."

Word got to the Chinese that a Nixon veto probably saved them from a nuclear assault. Honorable Mr. Nixon! They decided to invite him to Peking, along with his trusted hand-servant, Herr Kissinger, in order to send glowing films of his "Momentous" visit back to his re-election committee in the United States. Maybe Mr. Nixon would join with them in a sneak attack on Russian troops in Outer Mongolia?

All of this sounds very light headed and perhaps a bit sarcastic. I should get serious. A war between the two communist giants would not make things better for the United States. On the contrary, we would be inevitably sucked in on one side or the other. My deepest concerns are best expressed by the great Russian dissenter, the expatriated Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn:

"A conventional war would be the longest and bloodiest of all the wars mankind has ever fought. To die for an ideological war! And mainly for a dead ideology! This must not happen, ever!"

St. Pat's lament

By RAY TIE

After successfully skulking, swearing, and forcing myself through sixteen hours of classes and work last Tuesday, I retired to the Blue Wall for some much needed relaxation. As I walked through checkpoint Alpha, I thought I had erred in my decision to go to this particular place as it was unusually crowded and raucus for that time of the week. However, it soon became clear that the celebration of Saint Patrick's day was going through its warm-up laps in preparation for Sunday, the day of days for most Irish-Americans.

The significance of this day became clear to me only after moving from my home town to places more heavily inhabited by that ethnic group. Since then, I have payed yearly homage to this discovery with the same intensity as the Sullivan's, the O'Reilly's, the Murphy's and all others celebrating Patrick's defeat of the snakes.

Usually, the day opens with a green beer and closes with a green face, but it's all worth it for the experience of love and brotherhood one finds in famous Irish areas such as South Boston and Holyoke. Put on your green tie and socks and you are accepted as a spiritual, if not a filial, brother. Through beer after beer, song after song, and joke after joke, the day streaks by. Pats on the back abound, and everybody is your friend regardless of hair length or political orientation.

For me, this aura of peace and humanity is too much to pass up. I love it, and never want to be without it. It is something I anticipate months in advance.

But the day after always returns, and along with it come the hangover, the worry about whom I offended and to what extent I screwed up. Along with it comes the reality of American life, the dishonesty, the thievery, and the realization of the basically bad plight of many of yesterday's cohorts. Along with it comes the newspaper, carrying words of human suffering, gunfights, bombings, and death in the land of Saint Patrick. Words that knife me in the belly and make me wonder how I managed to feel so good the day before. Words that make me realize that the symbolism of that day is being manifested in war in Ireland. People are being killed, mutilated, and dislocated by a religious war. Vietnam is altogether too close in my memory for me to dismiss that fact with an 'Ah, so what?".

Unbelievable, isn't it? But good or bad, believable or unbelievable, human or inhuman, Sunday I will be suffused in some tank of music, ribaldry, and green beer, totally enjoying once again the spirit and affection of the Holiday.

Bubbles in your coffee?

This is a story, in three parts, about three people: a woman who is employed by University Food Services, a man who is employed by University Police and God, who doesn't normally come under the category of "people", mainly because he isn't employed by anybody.

That isn't to say that there aren't those who wouldn't mind utilizing His services every now and again. There are, and their numbers increase daily. In fact, God's services, at last check, were exceedingly more in demand than the services of either the woman employed by University Food Services or the man employed by University Police.

It's not abnormal for one to talk to God and request His services. (There's even a word to describe this phenomenon. It's called "praying".) Nor is it too out of the ordinary for one to think that he has received those services. (That's called "being blessed".) In fact, it's even acceptable for one to consider God a close friend.

What is out of the ordinary is: a) to think that God has taken time out of His busy schedule to talk to you; or, b) to consider God a close relative.

People who think God has spoken to them or who claim God as a dependent when they file their income tax are generally considered to be not in their right minds.

It gets harder and harder each day to determine who is in their right mind and who isn't. I used to think that the majority of the people were in their right mind, and that the deviants were not in their right minds. But then I saw what the majority of the people did in the 1972 Presidential election.

In the 1972 Presidential election, the majority of the people elected a man who is not in his right mind.

"What all of us need to do," said that man at the 22nd annual National Prayer Breakfast on January 31, "is pray in silence and listen to God to find out what He wants us to do."

In the 1972 Presidential election, the majority of the people elected a man who expects God to talk to people.

That's not to say that God is unable to talk to people. If God wanted to talk to people, I'm sure he could do a much better job of it than either the woman employed by University Food Services, the man employed by University Police, or even the President of the United States, for that matter.

In fact, I'm told that God can do anything He damn well pleases except, perhaps, create a stone so heavy that even He can't lift it. Scholars, professors, and other professional time-wasters (also, I might add, employed by universities as a rule) are still quibbling over that one. But what do they know? Do they ever talk to God? I'll bet some of them don't believe He exists. But he does. He happens to be vacationing in Mexico at the moment (until the next earthquake anyway), probably taking a break from everyone talking to Him so much.

Yes, God could talk to people if He really wanted to. He just never feels like it, that's all. Nothing unusual about that. Nobody really expects God to talk to them. Nobody in their right mind, that is. Some wives get upset when their husbands won't speak to them on Sunday afternoon, but they never get upset when God doesn't speak to them on Sunday mornings.

Most likely, the woman employed by University Food Services was such a wife and, undoubtedly, the man employed by University Police was such a husband. They probably don't know each other, but they both know God, or at least have heard of him. And they both probably go to church at least twice a year, though not necessarily the same church.

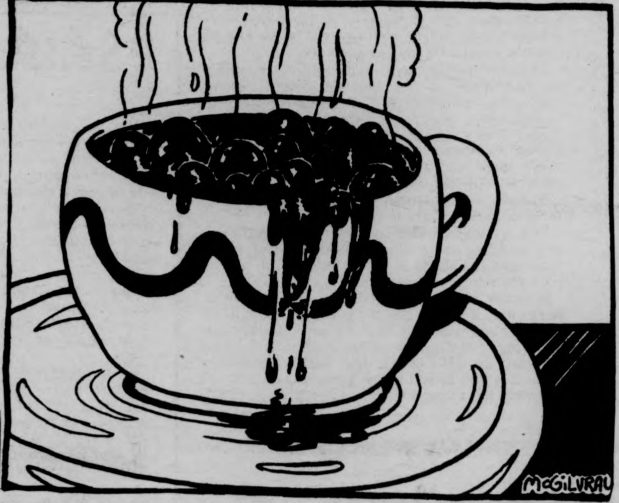
Church is where God hangs out when he's not vacationing in Mexico or in heaven. Heaven is up there somewhere. Lots of people go to church to talk to God. A ticket to Mexico is too expensive and a ticket to heaven is one-way only.

The man and the woman probably consider themselves religious, which is synonymous with going to church at least twice a year. But they are careful not to be too religious, because these days being too religious is synonymous with being not in your right mind. The only people who go out of their way not to be in their right minds are draft dodgers, but they're a rare breed nowadays.

God is always in His right mind. That's how He got to be God and the rest of us stayed people.

But if I talk anymore about God, I might as well stand on a New York City street corner and make a few bucks in the process. And, as everyone knows, people who do that are not in their right mind.

Instead, I will talk about how I did make a few bucks, (ten to be exact), and how I lost a few bucks, and how I got those few bucks back again, and how I lost them again, and how I tried to get them back again, and so on.



In other words, I'll talk about the woman employed by University Food Service and the man employed by University Police.

I.

She didn't have to do it. She could have easily picked it up and put it in her apron pocket, and I wouldn't have known the difference until I reached into my pocket to pay for lunch, and then I probably would have frowned, slightly embarassed, wondering what happened to that ten dollar bill I thought I had in my pocket, never guessing that it had fallen out while I was waiting in line at 7 a.m. in Worcester Dining Commons.

But she did it. The woman employed by University Food Services (whose name I, along with countless other UMies, never bothered to find out, and so we always refer to her and her colleagues as "dining commons ladies") walked over to me and my friend as we were hunting for clean forks and asked if we had lost any money.

"No, not me," I said sleepily as I reached for my wallet.

"Me, neither," said my friend.

"Make sure," admonished the dining commons lady, wagging her finger like a mother telling her son to dress warmly or else he'll catch his death of pneumonia.

"I don't think it was me," I shrugged, half apologetically. And then I remembered. That ten dollar bill, the one I found on my way to the dining commons, the one I had hurriedly stuffed into my pocket. It wasn't there.

"Oh!" I exclaimed. "Is it ten bucks?"

The dining commons lady smiled and with a triumphant gesture forced the bill into my hand.

"Be careful with that now," she warned. "Hang onto it."

"I will," I promised, but hanging onto it wasn't as easy as I thought it would be. But before I explain why, I'll talk about what the dining commons lady told me. She told me the same thing her mother used to tell her.

"When I was a little girl," she said, "my mother used to tell me that if you see bubbles in your coffee in the morning, that means that something will happen to you during the day concerning money."

"I didn't know that," I admitted.

"That's right," said the dining commons lady. "And do you know what I saw in my coffee this morning?" she asked.

"Bubbles," I guessed.

"Bubbles," she repeated. "And I said to myself, 'something's going to happen to me concerning money today'."

"Fancy that," I said. I finally found a clean fork and was now trying to track down a clean spoon.

"The last time I saw bubbles in my coffee, do you know what happened?"

"What's that?" I asked.

"I found eighty dollars. The same day!"

"Eighty dollars? Fancy that. I bet the guy who lost that was a little upset," I surmised.

"He got it back, though," she said.

"Yeah?"

"As soon as I found it, I put an elastic around it and hung onto it for three days before he finally came back to claim it. I was worried he wasn't going to come back."

By this time I had found a clean spoon.

"But he came back," I echoed.

"I was worried he wasn't going to," she confessed. "So you hang onto that now."

I thanked her again and then my friend and I found a table and started eating.

"Eighty bucks," I said. "Can you imagine finding eighty bucks?"

"Can you imagine saving it and giving it back to whoever lost it?" my friend added.

"Nobody in their right mind would lose eighty bucks," I said.

"Nobody in their right mind would find eighty bucks and than go out of their way to give it back." said my friend as he stood up to refill his orange juice glass.

"Do me a favor?" I asked. "While you're up, will you get me a cup of coffee?"

II.

Later that day, I found myself in Dickinson Hall, trying to appeal a ten dollar parking ticket which was attached to my windshield wiper while I was eating breakfast. I was talking to a man employed by University Police (whose name I, along with countless other UMies, never bothered to find out, and so we always refer to him and his colleagues as "campus cops" or, in moments of sheer disrespect, "campus pigs"), trying to explain to him, calmly and politely, why I wanted to appeal the ticket.

"Don't waste your time," he said matter-of-factly.

"What?!" I asked, slightly alarmed.

"Don't bother appealing it," he repeated. "It won't work. We'll catch up to you."

"But I was issued this ticket unfairly," I protested, "and I have a legal right to appeal it."

"We don't go around handing out tickets unfairly," he informed me. "You deserved that ticket and you know it."

"But it says I was parked in a posted tow zone and there is no sign anywhere near where I was parked which said 'Tow Zone' or 'No Parking'. There weren't any signs at all, for that matter."

The campus cop was unmoved.

"We can't help it if you kids go around tearing down the signs we put up," he said.

I decided that I wasn't going to argue with him; that would get me nowhere. I remembered how last semester I was issued a ten dollar ticket for parking so as to obstruct a building entrance, when in fact the shortest distance between my car and the nearest building was well over one thousand yards. And I remembered how, even after I offered to buy a few tape measures and prove it, I still ended up paying the ticket, because the campus cop at the desk talked me out of appealing it. But not this time.

This time, I demanded to fill out an application to appeal the ticket, all the while thinking how lucky I was that the dining commons lady didn't make me fill out an application to get my ten bucks back.

"Well, if you want to," said the campus cop, as he produced the proper form. "But make it quick. I've got to get out of here."

And so I filled in all the information on the sheet. Very carefully and, yes, very slowly. And as I filled in all the information, the campus cop was talking to me.

"You kids think you're so smart. You think you can get away with this, but you can't," he said. "They're going to do away with this whole appeals thing soon. You're not going to get away with this. You just better kiss the ten bucks goodbye," he chuckled.

"Did you have coffee this morning?" I asked him.

"Did I what?" he asked, glancing at his necktie.

"Did you have coffee this morning. Coffee. You know, the stuff you...."

"Coffee? Yeah, I have coffee every morning. So what?"

His tone changed from hard-assed to half-assed and back to hard-assed again.

"Were there bubbles in your coffee?" I continued.

"Were there what?!" he replied, confused.

"Bubbles. Were there bubbles in your coffee?"

"Bubbles!?" he cried. "Bubbles?! How the hell am I supposed to know if there were bubbles in my coffee?"

"Just wondering," I said as I handed him the completed appeals form, smiled and walked away.

III.

When I got outside I started thinking about how far a ten dollar bill can go in one short day. Better I should have lost ten dollars in the dining commons than in a parking lot, I thought. At least I got a meal. On the other hand, paying ten dollars for a dining commons breakfast is like paying ten dollars for a gallon of gasoline. Nobody in their right mind would ever do that.

And then I reached into my pocket.

It was gone.

The ten dollar bill was gone.

S-h-i-t.

I knew I had it when I came into Dickinson, so I must have dropped it when I took my pen out of my pocket, and....

I ran back inside.

The campus cop was still sitting at his desk.

"Say, you didn't happen to see a ten dollar bill lying around here by any chance, did you?" I asked him.

He shook his head.

"Nope."

When I walked outside this time, I wasn't smiling. What does it all mean, I wondered. Only one person knows what it all means. I'll have to ask Him.

And so I turned toward Mexico and yelled: "God! Hey, God!! How about You? Were there bubbles in Your coffee this morning?"

And out of the south came His answer, loud and clear:

"Are you in your right mind?" said God.

Historic preservation wanted for refinery site

PORTSMOUTH, N.H. (AP) — The federal government may be asked to declare the Isles of Shoals, under consideration as a site for an offshore oil terminal, as a national historic site.

Greek shipping magnate Aristotle Onassis had proposed the islands off the New Hampshire and Maine coasts as a site for an offshore superport for tankers bringing crude oil to a refinery in New Hampshire.

Olympic Refineries, Inc., which is owned by Onassis, has said that the offshore facility is vital for a New Hampshire refinery.

Edmund E. Lynch, director of a Portsmouth historic preservation group called Strawberry Banke Corp., said the agency has applied to the preservation commissions of Maine and New Hampshire to ask the federal government to protect the islands.

The story was first reported Tuesday by the Biddeford Saco, Maine, Journal.

The seven islands are located about six miles off the Maine and New Hampshire coasts. Four islands are in Maine and three in New Hampshire.

"We started prior to the time we ever knew Aristotle Onassis was in the picture," John F. Hallett, initiator of the move, told the Associated Press Tuesday.

"This is like saying you're going to tear down the Washington Monument and build an oil refinery," he said. "We wouldn't think of going to Greece and putting an oil refinery on the Acropolis."

The proposed refinery for Durham Point was rejected by the Durham townspeople and the New Hampshire House. But Olympic is now considering other possible refinery sites in New England including the factory town of Newmarket which borders Durham.

Holdup suspect arrested

HOLYOKE (AP) — A 38-year-old Sturbridge man has been arrested in connection with the February, 1973, holdup of the Holyoke National Bank.

Sturbridge police arrested Paul G. Callahan Wednesday.

Callahan pleaded innocent to indictments charging him with armed robbery and six counts of being an accessory after the fact of armed robbery in connection with the holdup, which netted $297,000.

Busing issue draws groups

SPRINGFIELD (AP) — Two local groups have taken sides in the Springfield School Committee's fight with the state Board of Education over busing.

Spokesmen for the East Springfield Homeowners' Association said yesterday the group endorses the school committee's position because members see little educational benefit in forced busing.

The committee is appealing to the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court a state Board of Education plan for Springfield to begin busing 5,800 pupils this fall.

The Title Parents Advisory Council, which works with programs for the educationally disadvantaged, Wednesday asked the school committee to abandon the court fight.

Lockouts confuse Boston strike

BOSTON (AP) - Work remained stopped at 100 construction projects in greater Boston yesterday, the fifth day of a dispute between heavy equipment operators and contractors.

Walter J. Ryan, business agent for Local 4 of the Operating Engineers Union, AFL-CIO, said about 1,500 of the 4,800 members of his local are on strike.

But thousands of workers in other unions have been locked out of their jobs, Ryan said, bringing to about 10,000 the number of persons idled by the dispute.

Local 7 of the Ironworkers Union has charged contractor lockouts at the Blue Cross, Christian Science Center, Beth Israel Hospital, Logan Airport, National Shawmut Bank and other projects in Boston; the Brayton Point power plant in Somerset, Salem City Hall and public school work sites in Framingham.

Detente clouded by Soviet statements

An AP News Analysis
By WILLIAM L. RYAN
AP Special Correspondent

The Russians sing a confusing variety of tunes these days.

Careful perusal of internal and external Moscow propaganda might engender serious doubts about peaceful coexistence, even as the Kremlin prepares for another Soviet-American summit.

First, on the Middle East — What the Russians say directly to Arabs is a long distance from sounding friendly to the United States as the Americans quest for Middle East settlement. It sounds almost as if the Russians fear there might be a reasonable settlement and feel impelled to head if off.

Second, on the international Communist scene — What is being said to parties around the world is that peaceful coexistence and detente are designed to hasten the triumph of Communist revolution and that Moscow remains faithful to that world goal. Third, what's being said at home — this suggests that some highly influential elements have doubts about the wisdom of the policy being pursued by Leonid I. Brezhnev, the Communist party general secretary. Such people, notably the high military brass, seem to fear he'll give away some valuable advantage in return for prospective trade benefits.

Moscow propaganda beamed in abundance to the Arabs sounds unrelievedly hostile to American efforts to bring about Middle East stability. The reader gets the impression that Moscow at once fears there will be a settlement and fears there won't be.

Middle East turbulence can threaten what Brezhnev hopes to gain from the detente and thus he might welcome a measure of calm. At the same time the settlement taking shape is an American one. Clearly Moscow worries about the Americans walking off with all the marbles, eroding the influence the Russians have been so carefully and expensively building for 20 years.

Moscow cheered the Arab oil boycott, warned Arabs that Israel and "forces protecting her" want to perpetuate the occupation of Arab lands, and claimed that any concessions from Washington and Jerusalem were forced upon them by a "new balance of power" brought about by Soviet policy.

David Rockefeller of Chase Manhattan Bank is extelled in one Soviet voice for espousing the idea of doing business with the Russians, but the voice that reaches Arabs blasts him as trying to impose capitalist concepts on Egypt's economy.

What does Moscow tell Communists around the world?

Typical are the assurances carried recently in a series of articles in the authoritative journal Party Life. These were deemed so important that they were broadcast in 17 Asian and European languages.

The articles angrily attacked mavericks such as those in the Spanish party who complain that Moscow, intent on Soviet state interests, is abandoning the cause of world revolution in its detente policies.

Moscow reminds them that the detente-coexistence policy was conceived as a weapon of strategy for world revolution, endorsed by a world Communist meeting in Moscow in 1969 and reaffirmed in 1971 at the 24th Soviet party congress, where the principle was stressed that detente meant sharpening, not lessening, of ideaological warfare.

"In its documents, the international Communist movement has more than once qualified the policy of peaceful coexistence," said Party Life. "It has underlined that peaceful coexistence...is a form of class struggle...The policy of peaceful coexistence helps give impetus to the class struggle against imperialism at national and world levels."

These articles insisted that "detente brings about new and more favorable premises to intensify the struggle for unity" of Communists around the world."

And what about Soviet military leaders?

It's not unusual for the military to express reservations about policy pursued by the civilian politicians.

Forum discusses energy crisis

By BILL MURPHY

Another in a series of lectures by the Great Decisions 1974 Forum was presented Wednesday night; the topic was "The Energy Crisis: What Impact? What Solutions?" The panel consisted of three distinguished professors at UMass.

The first speaker was economist Arthur W. Wright. Mr. Wright emphasized that the Energy Crisis is a problem out of control contrary to the opinion of Mr. Nixon, but that the crisis is not one of resources but rather one of man made policies. The only way to keep the problem from getting worse is by "not allowing ourselves to be distracted by Senator Jackson and others seeking high office in side issues like oil company profits...which are symptoms, not causes of this crisis."

Mr. Wright went on to sight the increase in oil prices abroad as coming about through the United States' and big companies' marketing arrangements assisting the world monopoly held by the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries (O.P.E.C.). He also stated the Arab Embargo is just a smoke screen, as it's settlement will have no bearing on the oil prices until the O.P.E.C. collapses. In addition Mr. Kissinger's plans to bargain with O.P.E.C. "will only help to sustain the problem."

Turning to the domestic scene the combination of quotas and price controls having very little to do with the Arab Embargo combined with some environmental pressures, "has caused a lag in refinery construction and a lag in developing new oil and natural gas resources." he said.

As possible solutions Mr. Wright felt a gradual disintegration of O.P.E.C. rather than attempting rash measures by ourselves, is necessary. In addition markets must be restored to functioning in energy goods, Simon must be fired as energy czar and not replaced, the government must get out of the energy business except to give subsidies for research in tentative energy resources rather than new techniques or products, and finally waking up environmentalists to help in this process.

The next panelist was Prof. David R. Inglis from the Department of Physics. Mr. Inglis seemed to feel that the crisis has put additional emphasis on nuclear energy to the point where "environmentalists and safety precautions are being ignored in favor of quick nuclear plant building programs."

"Of course these plants are being built in response to the crisis and the relative compactness of this energy is a definite advantage," said Inglis, "but they're also being built because of America's deep seeded financial interests in nuclear energy over the years. This interest has lead to a coverup of the dangers and difficulties of nuclear power."

Mr. Inglis went on to reveal that in the operation of nuclear plants the same material which atom bombs are made of is released and in one year of operation a plant will have stored in it enough of this material for approximately 1,000 atom bombs. "If a nuclear plant should release the radioactivity in it...it would be blown by the winds in a path of terrific lethality," he said. "We hope this will never happen-whether it will or not is a completely unproved question."

Mr. Inglis went on to say that should we continue to build nuclear plants the probability of nuclear accidents occuring could be as high as one a year. In addition to growth in this country continued export of reactors increases the threat of sabotage and global nuclear war.

Beyond cataclysmic releases, Mr. Inglis sighted everyday leakage of radioactivity by plants as possibly affecting us already. "Just how much damage has been done, how many infant deaths or malformed births is a very murky question" he said. "It is unlikely that we can survive in the future if the proliferation of nuclear leakage is increased"

Inglis said "We must stop the expansion of nuclear plants and export of reactors and lead the world into some other energy field particularly solar energy to avoid this dead end."

Inglis summarized his talk by pointing out that all power pollutes, is expensive, and dangerous. "The more power we use the worse off we are. We must learn restraint in the use of power and new types of power must be rapidly developed."

The final speaker was engineer William E. Heronemus, one of the nations leading experts in solar energy. He began by sighting fundamental faults with the present energy policy. "The first fault is planning to fuel an exponentially increasing demand from finite sources, i.e. doubling our fuel consumption in the next 10 years which I feel is unnecessary..."

The second is facing the "heat sink"...heat released during combustion and fission and the heating of cold water used to cool reactors and generators is increasing the global temperature..."Because of the increase in temperature that nuclear plants would cause, and the skyrocketing prices for these plants Heronemus sees nuclear power as a very unsuitable solution to our growth problem. "We frankly aren't going to be able to raise the capital to meet this exponential growth" he said.

Heronemus went on to show how this countries energy plans have failed to change in light of the present crises. He stated that in 1971 our policy was to use up all the petroleum in the world and not limit our dependence on foreign sources (called Project Dependence), use little coal but take solice in the fact that we have a huge store in the U.S., place maximum emphasis on proliferation of light-water reactor nuclear plants, and the cornerstone-put total emphasis on bringing along liquid-metal fast breeders; cheap energy for all time.

In 1974, he said our policies have changed little, we still think nuclear power will save us though costs have doubled in the past 18 months. "We ought to chuck the whole darn thing, and figure out a better way which I feel means solar energy", said Heronemus. It is an invariant heat system, non polluting, saves money and costs less than oil and nuclear power as time goes on."

There are three basic types of solar energy: Low temperature photo thermal which is a process for heating houses and building, wind power for generating electricity and homes, and the ocean thermal difference process which collects heat and cold off the surface of the ocean producing electricity or hydrogen as a synthetic fuel.

Heronemus sees the major problem facing solar energy is it's complexity and lack of immediate application and also the fear that the oil, coal, and nuclear field in which this country has invested so heavily might be ruined.

"Wrapping all of this up," said Heronemus, there is a need for getting on with alternatives, and a need for recognizing that other energy alternatives are possible this country must embark on Project Solar Dependence and step out and lead the entire world down this inevitable path."

Greek Navy rules sex is job hazard

ATHENS (AP) - If a sailor on shore leave dies while engaging in sex, it is considered an occupational hazard and his family gets a navy pension, Greece's highest court ruled Wednesday.

"Under this interpretation and specifically referring to the naval profession, it is understood that this work requires long periods of separation of a seaman from his wife and family, and the need for his recreation in areas he feels deprived," the court said.

Wine Cellar: worth visiting

By WILMA BRIER
AND CHARLES DOLAN

This is the first in a series of reviews of restaurants in the Five College area. We decided to start below The Wine Chariot, more specifically, at The Wine Cellar. A UMass Hotel and Restaurant Management student Peter Winters has started a student oriented dining area downstairs from The Wine Chariot. Using the same food and kitchen as the upstairs The Wine Cellar offers a varied menu with prices ranging from $2.00 to $4.00.

The atmosphere is intimate, relaxed and warm. Excellent and attentive service is provided. We didn't care much for Brazil '66 or Paul Mauriat playing softly in the background, but we were informed that there is live folk music on Friday and Saturday nights. There are plans to extend the restaurant to include a bar and dancing area separate from the dining area in order to preserve the intimate atmosphere.

We sampled enchilladas, veal and peppers, Boston schrod, and braciola. Our Mexican food expert from southern California felt that the enchillada ($2) were the best he'd had in this area although they could have been hotter. The veal and peppers ($3) was excellent and the portion generous. The braciola, and Italian beef roll,($4) had just the right amount of spice and is highly recommended. Our Bostonian seafood expert found the schrod($3) scrumptuous. All the $3 and $4 dinners come with salad and potatoes or spaghetti. Those who demand authenticity will be happy to know the cook doesn't speak a word of English.

You might want to finish up the meal with one of the desserts. We tried the rum cake (75 cents) and the Italian cheese-cake (75 cents). The rum cake was good. The cheese-cake may not please those expecting creamy style as it is of a more cakey texture. There is a small selection of domestic and imported beers as well as liquor. As for wine, they serve anything from a good dry Bordeaux white (1.50.5 carafe) to Chateau Mouton Rothschild at the bargain price of $150 a bottle.

Overall, we enjoyed the restaurant and highly recommend it. If you're looking for a good meal and pleasant atmosphere at cheap prices check this one out.

Prof. stresses environment at Mt. Holyoke symposium

By JANICE MEEHAN

"If we could turn back the pollution problem in the United States to the 1940's, there would be no environmental movement." So said Professor Barry Commoner of Washington University. His lecture was the first half of a symposium on "The Biological Imperative and the Limits to Growth" held this past weekend as an outgrowth of the Colloquim on Political Science-"International Politics and the Human Environment" taught by Mr. Ott of Mount Holyoke College.

The second half of the symposium took the form of a panel discussion between Professor Commoner and the proponents of several other views. Its members were Mr. Clifford Russell, currently a member of Resources for the Future, an economic development group, Mr. Rodger Nail of Dartmouth, co-author of the study The Limits to Growth, Mr. Ray Coffinger of Hampshire College, also an advisor to the United Nations, Dr. Michael Best of UMass, and Ms. Sally Montgomery of Mount Holyoke College.

The objective of the symposium was to discuss the problems inherent in continued industrial development relative to continued population expansion and depletion of natural resources. Should the "underdeveloped" nations follow the path of industrialization? Will the countries presently industrialized be able to continue their present rate of growth? If they do, what will be the consequences?

The authors of the Limits to Growth study have a Malthusian perspective on the answers to these questions and believe that the root cause of our present problems is population. Because we are dealing with a finite world, with definite limitations, continued exponential growth of population and energy consumption cannot be maintained without catastophic results. Mr. Nail stated that the answers lie in the stabilization of world population at the highest carrying level--that is, stabilization at a point where energy consumption could be maintained. The ideal situation would be one wherein resource limits could be expanded by technology and growth rate weakened by social legislation. As a means of substantiating this, the authors constructed "World III", a complex mathematical model designed to avoid what they term an "overshoot and decline" pattern of growth where great fluctuations in population would take place due to resource availabiliiy.

Professor Commoner however, does not believe that this approach is a valid one and does not accept the "aggregate global model" proposed in Limits to Growth. He believes that this approach takes only a few factors into consideration and makes assumptions on the nature of their relationships to each other. The analysis, in his mind, becomes both simplistic and incomplete.

Wiretapping charged in AIM trial

By JOHN LUNDQUIST

ST. PAUL, Minn. (AP) — The defense in the Wounded Knee trial filed a motion Thursday charging illegal government wiretapping during the armed occupation of the South Dakota reservation.

The latest defense motion, seeking dismissal of all charges against Russell Means and Dennis Banks, will be heard Monday and Tuesday, U.S. District Judge Fred Nichol said.

He said he would also hear another multi-point defense motion that asks dismissal for "governmental misconduct" in handling the case.

Means, 34, Porcupine, S.D., and Banks, 41, leaders in the American Indian Movement AIM, are charged with burglary, larceny, firearms violations, assault and conspiracy in the 71-day takeover of Wounded Knee last year.

The motion charging illegal wiretapping was filed by defense attorney Mark Lane. A supporting affidavit made these claims:

On or about Feb. 27, 1973, a U.S. marshal at Pine Ridge, S.D., Tommy Hudson. contacted M. Joe Pourier, manager of Bison State Telephone Co., at Pine Ridge. At Hudson's request, Pourier had a telephone installed on or about the next day in the Wounded Knee Trading Post. The phone line was tapped about a mile and one.half away at a government roadblock. Pourier said the tap led to an FBI car where a telephone was installed.

"Although the FBI extension or tap was ill-equipped to function as a means of communicating with the trading post, it could have served as a tap by an agent merely picking up the telephone," the affidavit stated.

Pourier was quoted as telling Lane he was asked to repair the line several times because wires were cut or shot and telephone poles toppled.

The phone at the trading post was used almost constantly for many days during the siege, both by those occupying the village and newsmen who found it the only outlet available.

The defense motion claimed the wiretap violated a 1868 government treaty with the Sioux tribe.

Asst. U.S. Atty. R.D. Hurd said at a session among counsel in Nichol's chambers Wednesday he knew of no illegal taps the government made. He said he plans to call three witnesses to back that up.

Police search for assaulter

By FRITS GEURTSEN
MDC Staff

Police are continuing their investigation into the assault of a UMass bus driver, Wednesday night.

Police are looking for a Black male who alledgedly boarded the bus at Squire Village and assaulted driver Don Peloquin, after accusing him of deliberately passing him by earlier in the vening.

Of the six passengers who were on the bus at the time of the incident, three have come forward as witnesses.

David Johnston, Director of Public Safety for the University, said "We have a pretty good chance of apprehending the person, but we won't go beyond an investigation unless an actual complaint is lodged. So far there has been no such action."

Johnston said Sunderland police were also involved in the investigation, since the incident took place there. The Sunderland Chief of Police has also called in the aid of the State Police.

Resource depletion debated at Holyoke experiencing in regards to pollution and depletion of resources are not due to either an increase in affluence or population, but rather to a shift in technological processes. It is a shift to basic processes of production which require greater amounts of energy and return higher profits. He thinks that the solutions are to be found in the redirection of technology and a reordering of the social and economic system along socialist lines.

One of the first examples he used was that of beer. Per capita consumption of that commodity has not changed since World War II. That is, the increase in production has just kept pace with population increase. However, per capita consumption of beer bottles has increased forty times apiece, to nonreturnable bottles used only once. This means that where once the materials to produce one bottle were needed, forty times that amount is now needed. The crux of this problem is that the newer bottle returns a higher rate of profit. Given our present economic system the probability that we will return to less "Expensive" forms of production are slight. He used several other examples to illustrate this point and while the details varied, the basic situations were the same.

The necessity for radical societal change is a moot point in Mr. Commoner's mind. He does not, as the "Limits to Growth" group does, consider the social system to be a constant and feels that it can be changed: "We made a model (in 1776) and there is no reason why we couldn't do it again."

IMPORTANT NOTICE

WACKY radio will not be on the UMass campus tonight as previously planned.

WACKY had previously planned to give out prizes for streakers spotted with WACKY bumper stickers on their backs. These plans have been cancelled.

Our radio station had been flooded with calls in the past few weeks with information on would-be streaks. It was our intention to give prizes to streakers wearing WACKY bumper stickers as just a fun-type promotion.

On Wednesday, we were informed by University officials that WACKY, as a private enterprise, could not register streakers in the Campus Center, nor could we hold any organized Streak-A-Thon on the UMass campus, as this would appear to be an event sanctioned by the University.

It was our understanding then, that as long as we did not register streakers on campus, or hold any sort of official streaking, everything would be allright. On Thursday morning, we ran an ad in the Collegian to the effect that our personnel would be on campus Friday night. If any persons who were planning to streak wore a WACKY bumper sticker, they would be given a gift certificate for the prizes originally planned for the Streak-A-Thon.

On Thursday afternoon, we were informed that our station would not be allowed to promote, in any form, shape, or manner, streaking on the UMass campus, we then decided to cancel all streaking promotion plans, so as to avoid any legal problems, and to avoid any problems we may cause for UMass students.

Since some 350 prizes, worth $2,500, had been solicited for the purposes of the Streak-A-Thon, it is our feeling that these prizes should go to the students. Therefore, WACKY will devise a way of giving out these prizes to UMass students within the next two weeks. Our initial thought is a bumper sticker promotion...on cars, bikes, etc. Details of this promotion will be seen in the Collegian, and heard on WACKY in the next few days.

We apologize for any problems we may have caused UMass officials and students.

Sincerely,
Bob Brooks
Program Director
WACKY Radio

P.S. Save those bumper stickers!!

Hitchhiker slain

BOSTON (AP) - Michael B. Jones, 20, of the Jamaica Plain section was charged with murder yesterday in the shooting death of a man who told him he had no money.

The victim was identified as Richard Eckman, 23, of the Brighton section, a guitar player at a Commonwealth Avenue club.

Police said Eckman was killed by a hitchhiker, picked up by the victim and Elizabeth Kamman, 21, of Newton in Kenmore Square in Miss Kammon's car.

They said Eckman was shot after the man in the back seat, drew a revolver and demanded money when they had reached Centre Street in the West Roxbury section.

Miss Kamman said she gave the man $5 and said it was all she had.

ASTROLOGICAL FORECAST

By SYDNEY OMARR

Persons born on the 9th, 18th or 27th have a unique kind of charisma. They also attract people with problems. Many are attorneys, physicians, politicians or in the theater. These individuals, especially if born under Aries, are dynamic, aggressive, have an abundance of courage and are not afraid of a fight. Many have a special mark or scar on head area and often are known to "stick out their necks."

ARIES (March 21-April 19): Travel and education are featured. You will be dealing now with persons born under Leo, Aquarius and Scorpio. Overall view is preferable to narrow, concentrated form. You are going to change your mind and this is no reason for embarrassment.

TAURUS (April 20-May 20): You obtain answers previously hidden, obscured or withheld. Change of scenery is distinct possibility. Gemini, Virgo persons are in picture. Talkative associate tells tale out of school. Be amused, not necessarily impressed.

GEMINI (May 21-June 20): Steady pace now Could be great asset. Avoid upsetting emotional apple cart. Binding agreement could be featured. Be receptive, somewhat passive. Strive to see various points of view without diluting your own sincerity.

CANCER (June 21-July 22): You may feel affairs are at a halt or moving backward. Truth is that you are getting proverbial second wind. Know it and take a good look around--form conclusions based on direct observation. Show that you are capable of performing special service.

LEO (July 23-Aug. 22): Nothing is halfway--this includes relationship with opposite sex. Don't play games with emotions. Stakes are such that you could be hurt or inflict injury on one who cares for you. Find creative outlet for ideas, energies. You will successfully meet challenge.

VIRGO (Aug. 23-Sept. 22): Conclusions are reached--the end of matters is featured. Aries, Libra persons could figure prominently. Question arises about property ownership or dividing lines. Older person knows the answers and will share knowledge.

LIBRA (Sept. 23-Oct. 22): You are able now to get into places, see people previously denied. Means this is a time to be versatile, to display humor--and resourcefulness. Sagittarius, Leo persons figure prominently. You are given opportunity for added indipendence of thought, action.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23-Nov. 21): Give full play to intuitive intellect. Applies especially where investment opportunities enter picture. One who shared knowledge in past will make reappearance. You are not alone. Be aware of it and in good spirits.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov.22-Dec. 21): You are in "sync." Means what was awry will fall into place. Your timing is sharp; you make right moves. Another born under your sign could figure prominently. Welcome new contacts. Socialize and exchange ideas.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22-Jan 19): What you seek is most likely to be hidden. You must look behind the scenes. Separate fact from illusion. Deal with Leo, Scorpio, Aquarius persons. Visit individual confined to home, hospital. Be considerate. Don't try to force views on one who is stubborn.

AQUARIUS (Jan 20-Feb. 18): Accent is on fulfillment, friendship and meaningful relationship. Your gregarious nature finds expression. Popularity increases. You are more likely to win than in recent past. Be ready for change, travel and a variety of experiences.

PISCES (Feb. 19-March 20): Accent is on ambition, career, standing in community. Family reconciliation is indicated. Domestic area becomes more harmonious. Taurus, Libra persons are in picture. Individual in position of authority will support you.

IF TODAY IS YOUR BIRTHDAY you are sensitive, appreciate creative arts and have compelling voice. You tend to neglect diet, skip meals and break rules. Many born under Taurus and Libra are attracted you. May could be your most important month of 1974. You will make money with Aries.

R.I. school paper hit for story

CRANSTON, R.I. (AP) - The chairman of the Cranston School Committee has launched an investigation into publication of an article on birth control in the Cranston High School East student paper.

"Frankly, I deplore the publication of the article. It's beyond the bounds of what should be published in the newspaper in a public school," Chairman Edward DiPrete said.

The article, entitled "Birth Control: Enjoying Sex Without Fear," was written by Avis Gunther, a 15-year-old sophomore, in the school newspaper Thunderbolt.

Miss Gunther said most of the information for the story came from pamphlets available in the school library. She and feature editor Chris Maxwell said the article was published to educate students on the various methods of birth control, and not to endorse or condone pre-marital sex.

The school committee has directed its lawyer, Vincent J. Piccirilli, to research committee policy regarding stories published in public school newspapers and to report to the board Monday. Committeeman were inconclusive as to whether any disciplinary action was being contemplated against the students or faculty adviser Paul Martin because of the matter. But Committeeman Christopher Buenanno said he felt "it was an error in judgment, and if the committee comes down on a teacher, it should first examine its own policies."

"I'm flabbergasted the way it blew up," Miss Gunther said.

Poetry reading

Peter Alpers and Joeffrey Bartman will read their work Sunday evening in the Colonial Lounge of the Student Union Building, beginning at 8 p.m. Admission is free, instant coffee and tea will be available without charge.

Alpers and Bartman are candidates for the Master of Fine Arts writing degree here; Alpers has published his fiction in the local Spectrum and elsewhere; Bartman's poetry has appeared in Carolina Quarterly, The Emerson Review, and other journals of poetry.

Careers abound for women

When it comes to choosing a field or a specific industry in which to pursue your career, let your imagination soar. As a young woman of the 1970's, you are not limited to recipe-writing, singing, or publishing to make your mark.

Social services, education and mental health fields have long been open. Depending on the area and the agency, women outnumber men. Chances are that you can apply your skills in areas such as travel, public relations, consumer products, public utilities, entertainment, management and government. Business and industry are actively seeking women engineers, accountants and other specialists in short supply.

Several resources are available as you begin to make your career plans. One is the Occupational Outlook Handbook, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor. In addition to outlining the basic tasks and responsibilities involved in each job or career, there is information on where such jobs are available, education and training required and the anticipated rate at which openings will occur through the seventies. Also be sure to check Business World, the quarterly career magazine for college students.

Cuban culture to be shown

The CUBAN CULTURAL NIGHT will be held Saturday at 8:00 p.m. in Greyson Rec. Room on Orchard Hill. Sponsored by the Venceremos Brigade, a multi-racial educational project which sends North Americans to work in Cuba, the evening will be a reflection of Cuba's Culture and politics.

Food, Afro-Cuban music, poetry and slides will highlight the festival. It's a chance to meet students who've gone to Cuba and a chance to learn about the Cuban Revolution, while practicing one of socialism's many principles — having a good time. Beer and wine will be available.

There will be a 75 cent admission charge. All proceeds help to finance the Western Mass. contingent to the Venceremos Brigade this spring.

Notes, quotes and anecdotes

Political lecture

William Connolly of the University Political Science Department will present a lecture Sunday, at 8 p.m., titled "Political Corruption: Behind Watergate." The lecture is one of a series, "The World of Learning," presented this spring by Project Ten, the campus experimental college.

Connolly, who is a member of the Five-College Union for a Radical Political Economy, is the author of Political Science and Ideology and the editor of the collection, The Bias of Pluralism.

"My intention is not to give a dreary recitation of all the specific charges and all the many indictments," Connolly says, "but rather to look behind the phenomenon of Watergate and discover the nature of the system which produced it."

Connolly, who is one of the nation's leading critics of the "pluralist" explanation of American politics, believes that the dominant tradition in American political science, which continues to be the pluralist "balance of power" theory, is no longer viable to explain the transactions of power among big corporations and big government.

Collusion and conspiracy, Connolly argues, is now at least as characteristic of power in America, and the "elites" which wield it, as is the open bargaining for influence assumed by pluralist analysts: "Watergate is simply the final evidence of this pattern."

Ensemble concert

A variety of musical textures will be featured in the UMass Wind Ensemble's Tuesday concert at 8 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium.

The ensemble, conducted by John A. Jenkins, will perform Symphony No. 4, Op. 165 by Alan Hovanhess, "They Walked in Darkness" by Jerry Bilik with script by Michael Whorf, and Symphony No. 3 for Band by Vittorio Giannini.

The work by Hovanhess, first performed in 1958 by the American Wind Symphony, is reflective of a wide range of musical sources including melodies from the Himalayan Mountains, 7th century Armenian religious music, classical music of South India, orchestral music of the Tang Dynasty, and various operas and oratorios by Handel.

The concert is open to the public without charge.

Guru film

A documentary film on Guru Maharaj Ji will be shown next week for the benefit of the Amherst-Northampton community. The film, honored as the best documentary in 1973 by the Atlanta International Film Festival, may be viewed Monday night at 7:00 in Lecture room III, Merrill Science Center, Amherst College; Tuesday night at 7:00 in auditorium room B15, McConnell Hall, Smith College; or Wednesday night at 7:30 in room 917, Campus Center, U. Mass. Music and discussion accompany the film. Admission to all programs is free.

Gay dance

The Student Homophile League and the Gay Women's Caucus will sponsor a dance tomorrow night at Farley Lodge beginning at 9:00. The dance will be a special fund-raiser for the benefit of this May's annual Amherst Gay Festival. A small donation will be requested at the door. All members of the gay community are cordially welcomed.

Parking billing

When the Balanced Transportation and Parking System was started last year, students were offered the option of paying the parking convenience fee in two installments. All students selecting this option were billed during intersession.

Any student who has not paid the balance of this parking fee is urged to do so prior to April 1, 1974. Parking fees unpaid after that date will be considered grounds for revoking campus parking privileges.

Any questions concerning billing should be directed to the Parking Office, 103 Hampshire, Tel. 545-0065.

Silber reading

Joan Silber will give a reading from her own work Tuesday at 8 p.m. at Grace Church, on Spring St. in Amherst.

A short story writer who lives and works in New York, Joan Silber has given many public readings of her prose. Her work has appeared in "Redbook," "Aphra," "Up From Under" and other literary magazines.

Summer workshops to study alternative lifestyles

A series of 30 summer "how-to" workshops intended to teach participants how to live with the current energy-economic crunch has been announced by the Division of Continuing Education here.

Conceived as a living Whole Earth Catalogue, "Toward Tomorrow: A Symposium of Alternatives" is a series of courses designed to find a place in the lives of all people who are concerned with their environment and their future.

Beginning June 14, week-long sessions will be held on such topics as alternative energy sources, food production, shelter, ecology and "funky stuff" that includes projects ranging from the building of electric cars to sensitivity training.

Most sessions will be repeated each week during three consecutive weeks. Enrollment is open to the general public, and participants may register for one, two or three weeks of workshops. This unique summer college program will be held at the UMass-Amherst campus, with many workshops conducted outdoors. (Plans are being made for a campground site for people wishing to camp out overnight.)

Further information is available from "Toward Tomorrow," Division of Continuing Education, UMass Amherst 01002, (413) 545-3103.

JV hockey roundup

Farm crop disappoints

By GLENN POSTER

Some people make a lot of effort to acquire recognition. Teams do the same. Take our hockey team-they play their "home" games off campus. That doesn't say much for the JV's if the varsity can't get their acclaim. After all a JV team in any sport is a supporting cast-a farm system.

Each player must start somewhere in developing, maturing and acquiring skills. That, of course, is the number one priority of a JV team. Coach Russ Kidd made this point saying, "The kids who play JV must overcome some weaknesses they all have." And it was Jack Canniff, the varsity coach, who amplifies on the them: "Some (JV players) are held back by physical attributes, they may need a year to mature."

But, the problems don't end there: Some players quit the team out of sheer frustration because they feel that, in some cases, they may have played a bit too long at the JV level and have little, if any, chance for promotion.

As for the season itself, Coach Kidd summed it up in one word-"disappointing." The team's record was 7-8-1. However, before intersession the mark was 5-2-1. While varsity teams play during the semester break, such was not the case with JV hockey. They broke from December 12 until January 28-almost six weeks. According to Coach Kidd, "That's the hardest part of the year. We had two days of practice after the break and then played Division One teams." (an 8-4 loss to the Yale freshmen)

Tough teams for the Minutemen were BC, RPI, Harvard, and Yale. All these opponents claimed victory over the JV skater. (BC bombed the team 9-1 and one of the RPI games was a 10-4 pasting). On the other hand, a lot of games were lost in the final five minutes.

As far as individuals were concerned, the scoring was pretty well spread out. Steve Ryan, one of the top scorers, "gave a hundred per cent all year on right wing," according to Coach Kidd. The sophomore, who saw brief action with the varsity, had 12 goals and 10 assists for a total of 22 points. Freshman forward John Archer led the team in scoring with 13 goals and 16 assists for a total of 29 points. On the blueline, Bob Jefferson was rated the top defenseman by both Coaches Canniff and Kidd. The freshman from Belmont has a good chance to move up to the varsity next season.

Coach Kidd had this to say about his four goalies: "Dana Redmond was the top netminder, John Riley played tough. Andy Pelley saw a lot of ice time, and Doug Janik simply didn't get enough work. (Janik was the top goalie in Western Mass last year) All of them are capable performers."

As far as the future goes, Coach Kidd said, "The bulk of recruiting comes from the Boston area. However, players would rather go to Division One teams that have their own rinks. We need a rink for better business."

The players went out and played to near-empty arenas. They deserve a reat deal of credit for just hanging in there. They deserve more than what they have been accustomed to getting.

"Stribblers" rest in Darien

By DAVE EIBEL

The "dirty dozen dribblers of UMass" continued on their merry way to New York City yesterday, and completed their day's palming in Darien Connecticut, approximately 70 miles from Fun City.

But the story of the trip so far occured last night in Avon, Connecticut. The dribblers pranced into a local bar where they were introduced to a new drink called a "dribbler's delight" by a fetching Avon barmaid. The drink, a mixture of vermouth and southern comfort, was described by group spokesman Grant Baxter, as being "pleasant but a definite stein."

After the dribblers imbibed their libation, two of them streaked across the street to their motel, and luckily, escaped the clutches of the ever-alert Avon police.

The dribblers awoke at 6:00 yesterday morning and travelled to Darien via New Haven, where the second amusing event of the day occurred. The group, trying to survive the incredibly bad driving of New Havenites, invented a new game called "dodgecar." The game involves dribbling in the middle of the road, avoiding oncoming and ongoing traffic.

Baxter, in describing New Haven drivers said, "I don't care what they say about Boston or New York drivers, but these drivers (in New Haven) must get their licenses from Railroad Salvage."

The "dirty dozen" left New Haven unscathed only to run into the police of West Haven who mustered three squad cars to confront the twelve UMies and find out what they were up to.

After a quick interrogation at roadside the group was allowed to continue bouncing merrily along after being bid adieu by a West Haven man-in-blue who said, "I'll bet we'll get a lot of publicity for being the only town to run you guys off the road." The same policeman also added, "we're run by a bunch of jerks," although he used a far stronger word in place of "jerks."

Although one dribbler was almost totalled by a sixty-foot tractor trailer, and another dribbler lost his hat in the Connecticut River, everything looks good for Saturday night at the Garden...with the dribblers and 6000 wild UMies.

What the stars say about

UMass vs. the Dolphins

As all good UMass sports fans know, Saturday is the beginning of the National Invitational Basketball Tournament in New York City. The Minutemen open up at seven o'clock at night against a tall and talented Jacksonville team, and while the coaches have been consulting their stat sheets in preparation, I've been consulting the stars. The application of astrology to mundane affairs is a very old practice which has proved remarkably accurate over the ages. What I've done is erected chairs for the basketball team (based on the time and date of their first practice last sunner) and for Coach Leaman. I've combined this information for a chart for New York City for Saturday night at seven p.m. Ideally I would also do charts for the Jacksonville coach and team, but I haven't been able to get that data at this time.

In trying to predict the outcome of the game I've tried to discover the character of the UMass team and relate it to the time of the game. As Coach Leaman's birth sign is Capricorn, it follows that his teams are always well disciplined. Capricorn is ruled by the planet Saturn which is the planet of order and structure, making it unlikely that Coach Leaman would direct a squad of run and gunners like the Jacksonville bunch. In determining the outcome of mundane days. Fortunately for the Minutemen, the Moon will be in the sign of Capricorn on Saturday night. This augurs well for the control game which UMass has affairs the position of the Moon is of great importance as the Moon changes signs every two and a half mastered in the course of the season. With the sign of Virgo (the Virgin) on the Ascendant at game time, there will be little room for error by either team.

Daily Collegian

UMass must begin with a strong defensive effort. Their relative lack of size makes proper position play and boxing out on the boards a necessity. If the Minutemen can do this they should carry it over to the offense where they will get the open fifteen footers they hit so well. Normally an excellent shooting team, the Minutemen have no reason not to do so on Saturday night. I believe that the tempo of the game will be obvious very early, particularly if Jacksonville has difficulty with UMass' defensive quickness. coach Gottlieb of Jacksonville may be forced to make adjustments early, and if the Minutemen retain their poise and discipline they will be able to control the tempo of the game.

In the end, I don't think that it will be Jacksonville's play that determines the game so much as the level of communication Coach Leaman attains with his players. He'll be the man in the middle who'll be shouting at the refs and his players in the midst of the Garden din. I think that Jack Leaman is going to have to balance the high level of emotionalism in the air with a clear concise basketball mind. But with his Moon in Libra (the signs of the scales of balance) he is well equipped for the job. In the end it will be his coaching skills and the well disciplined shooting and defense of the Minutemen that should put UMass on top by at least six to eight points.

Rich Sevieri talks about the history of UMass athletic facilities next week.

The (real) intramural NIT

By RUSS SMITH

Intramural Basketball at the Arena:...And they're off-down at Boyden. The playoffs for the Campus Championship. Wednesday night, half of those 'good' teams (during the regular season) bowed out in the first round of play.

Undecided as to which games to watch, I put all the courts in a hat, and picked one at random. Court number one, won. So from 5:15-9:15, I was a temporary resident of court one, to hopefully see some exciting basketball.

Game One: The best game of the night had to be this one; the Knicks and the Ossibissa! It had everything: great defense, good offense, some sharp plays, excellent passing, and even good sportmanship. So, wouldn't you know, that at the end of regulation play, the score would be tied at 18 all, sending the game into a three minute overtime.

In any case the overtime period was like the game, and at the end, the Ossibissa had won it, 24-21. It's too bad that one of these two teams had to lose, because neither one really deserved to . The rest of the campus contenders had better watch out, because the Ossibissa is hot, and there seems to be no stopping them (this is their second playoff victory-they eliminated the J.B's Tuesday night).

Game Two: There is a theory that the key to winning in basketball is a really sharp defense-and that was the key in the Nixon Bombers victory over the Hamlin Skunks.

The final was the Bombers-45, the Skunks-22. The Bombers deserved this one-they kept Hamlin outside, forcing them to either take a frustration shot, or throw it away. The B's raced to a 11-2 lead (didn't miss a shot during that time, while the Skunks kept hitting the rim, missing 10 of their first 11 shots) before Hamlin called a timeout to get reorganized. But then fouls hurt the Skunks as much as the B's sharp shooting, and at the half, it was 26-6, and that was the game. Hamlin, oddly enough, does have a decent team, ("We deserved to lose," one HS player) but a team like the Bombers who ended up with a shooting percentage of 77.2, wasn't about to lose.

Game Three: You win some, you lose some, and sometimes you win some for the other team. Take the Trees from Crabtree vs. Phi Mu Delta; not taking any credit from the frat, but if the Trees had hit more on foul shots, this would have been a real tight ballgame. But as I said, had luck been at the Stripe for Ben and the guys, it could've been at least a 40-37 game. Phi Mu Delta had an eight point lead at the half, but the Trees forced them into numerous turnovers to keep in the game, for awhile.

Game Four: After three games in a row, I should've realized a fourth great game would be too much. And was I ever right!! The Pacemakers had the height, the moves and the outside shooters-which was enough to wash the Wizards from Southwest 57-25.

Now, to say the game was a complete bore, would be a mistake (I wouldn't say that about any game, no matter how boring it made me.) There was a highlight: When Lauraine's older brother, Bob, went in the game and got a basket, she screamed so loud it woke me up.

But what does all this have to do with the title, NIT? This NIT stands for the Neurotic Intramural Tournament.

See you in the next round.

Red Sox orbit Astros, 8-2

WINTER HAVEN, Fla. (AP) — Reggie Cleveland pitched five scoreless innings and Carlton Fisk belted two homers, one a tape measure job, as the Boston Red Sox breezed Thursday to an 8-2 exhibition victory over the Houston Astros.

Cleveland, acquired from the St. Louis Cardinals in an off-season trade, allowed just one hit, a bad hop grounder to short, and the Red Sox went on to their sixth victory in seven Grapefruit League starts.

North Carolina, the team to beat...

NIT Team Synopses

By STEVE SARACENO

Sixteen teams wage basketball bedlam in the preliminary rounds of the NIT this weekend. Much has been printed on these pages about two of those teams, UMass and Jacksonville, but maybe you don't know all that much about the other fourteen.

So, here are some facts on them:

FAIRFIELD--has a record of 17-8...playing in it's second NIT...lost to Virginia Tech (the eventual champion) last year in the quarterfinals, 77-76...top players are Richie O'Connor, who averaged 17 pts. per game, and guard John Ryan, who broke Ernie DeGregorio's NCAA assist record...

HAWAII-- 18 wins, 8 losses...also in it's second NIT...led by first year coach Bruce O'Niel...star performer is backcourtman Tom Henderson, considered the best guard in the nation..he averages 19.5 a game...

BOSTON COLLEGE--18.8...fourth NIT appearance...lost to Temple in the finals in 1969...the last year Bob Cousy coached the team...this year they're led by Bob Carrington (18.7), Mark Raternik, and Jerry Nolan...

Bruins free Sanderson

By KEN HOSKINS
Associated Press Writer

BOSTON (AP) - The Boston Bruins have given the okay for suspended center Derek Sanderson to talk with other teams in the National Hockey League, Sanderson's attorney, Bob Woolf, said Thursday.

Woolf announced the agreement after an hour and a half meeting with Bruins president Western Adams Jr. and general manager Harry Sinden.

Sanderson was suspended Monday for the remainder of the season and the playoffs after he missed the team plane returning from Oakland Sunday night. His decision to stay on the West Coast came after a dressing room fight with winger Terry O'Reilly.

Woolf said the Bruins agreed today to fine Sanderson only for missing the plane.

Another meeting between Woolf and the Bruins management is to be held in a week to 10 days, the attorney said, after he has had a chance to shop around the league for a possible spot for the flamboyant center.

Woolf noted that although the trading deadline was March 10, trades could be made as long as the player doesn't play for his new team this season.

"I've heard that a number of other clubs are interested in Sanderson and now we'll see," Woolf said.

Woolf said he was announcing the result of Thursday's meeting because Sinden had left for Buffalo, N.Y. When contacted, the Bruins office said no one was available to comment.

Asked if the Bruins still had the door closed on Sanderson's ever playing for Boston again, Woolf said he thought their offer to let him talk with other teams was indicative of that.

"I tried to leave the door open as much as possible," Woolf said, adding that he had suggested the length of the suspension be shortened.

Asked what he would do if he can't find another team for Sanderson and the suspension stands, Woolf said:

"The only other alternative I would have myself is to appeal to the president of the National Hockey League."

"Derek would like to play hockey. He wouldn't mind playing for the Bruins. He still has a great affection for Boston and the Bruins."

Sanderson, Woolf said, is still on the West Coast.

Sanderson's suspension was announced in a one paragraph statement which said the action was for "conduct detrimental to the proper operation of the hockey team."

Sinden later said it stemmed from a series of incidents and that he blamed himself for not solving the problem earlier in the season.

Woolf has maintained that the issue is a serious personality conflict between the 27-year-old Sanderson and Coach Bep Guidolin.

"That's what Derek feels very strongly," Woolf said Thursday. "He likes his teammates, Sinden and everybody else."

Prediction Poetry

Tomorrow night marks the start of the 1974 National Invitation Tournament in Madison Square Garden. Hence, the Magical, mystical one that I go to for meditation has looked into his crystal ball and come up with the following predictions. (All I ask is that if you're going to bet according to my picks, be forewarned that I also picked USC over UCLA.)

SATURDAY, MARCH 16,
The guards, the Center, and Skinner and Trow
Back to florida the Dolphins go.
UMASS 74...JACKSONVILLE 63
The Hawaii Rainbows with Henderson, et al
And poor old Fairfield's gonna fall:
HAWAII 79...FAIRFIELD 70
Eastern shore will surly flatten
The local choice which is Manhattan.
MARYLAND-EASTERN SHORE 95...MANHATTAN 82
From A.C.C. to N.I.T.
It's the Tarheels of U.N.C.
NORTH CAROLINA 101...PURDUE 84

SUNDAY, MARCH 17
They'll try with all their might
But no go for the Purple Knights.
UTAH 71...RUTGERS 61
In the midst of vociferous fans
UConn upsets the Redmen's plans
UCONN 82...ST. JOHNS 77
The Cincinatti kid need not squak
He'll see his team win in New York
CINCINATTI 86...BOSTON COLLEGE 79
In a battle of yawns one must fall
And so in this one it's Seton Hall
MEMPHIS STATE 77...SETON HALL 75

Well there you have it. I have one more request; don't come to me on Monday and say I told you so because you didn't and I'm locking my doors so you can't.

Superweekend hits UMass!

'Cagey' gymnwomen peak for Easterns

By CANDY GROSS

If anyone has walked into Boyden Auxiliary Gym this week to watch the women prepare for the Easterns, they would have felt the sparks of excitement emanating from these gymnasts. It's obvious this isn't just another meet.

According to Assistant coach Mike Kasavana the team has been working hard and is peaking at the appropriate time. Looking ahead to the cause of this fervor, The Easterns, he says, "We're anticipating a capacity crowd and I'm sure we won't disappoint them. We have had strong support on campus and would like to show them our appreciation by finally winning the Easterns."

The tentative six-deep line-up for UMass has been drawn up based on individual's scores and consistency in this season's eight collegiate meets.

Vaulting, UMass' second strongest event, will be at its height with Heidi Armstrong, Anne Vexler, Marian Kulick, Linda Nelligan, Margie Combs and Jeannine Burger. Swinging into action on bars will be Gail McCarthy, Linda, Margie, Anne, Betsy East and Jeannine. On beam are Marian, Margie, Heidi, Jodi Hitt, Jeannine and Anne. Finally the strongest event, floor exercise, will see performances by Marian, Alicia Goode, Jodi, Margie, Jeannine and Anne. UMass' three All Around competitors are Anne Vexler, Jeannine Burger and Margie Combs. An impressive line-up.

One of the most interesting aspects of any high level competition is each individual's feelings and expectations. Following are some of the comments from the ten women making up the Easterns team.

Anne Vexler, exuding confidence in UMass chances said, "So far our workouts have gone well this week. We're really preparing oursleves well in terms of team competition. We're going to be very impressive!"

Marian Kulick touched on a different aspect of the meet. "I'm really glad it's going to be in a home gym with a large home crowd. This will definitely help our confidence."

The line-up contains only one freshman, Linda Nelligan. Never having competed on such a high level as this she admits she's very nervous.

In high school I was in state competitions, but the pressure and expectations weren't as high. This is more important since what happens in this meet. will carry over into the Nationals."

Of course, Springfield, being top seeded and perennial Eastern Champs, is a subject on everyone's mind. Several of the women had thoughts on this.

Gail McCarthy, was also excited about competing for the first time in the Easterns.

"I can't wait for it to start! We'd love to beat Springfield and I think we will. But all we can do is our best."

Floor specialist, Alicia Goode, looks at it from the aspect of the total school. "It would be nice for UMass to break Springfield's unbroken Eastern record. The way workouts have been going and our ability to surpass 100 points in most meets, even when we break, means we ought to do well."

Throughout the season UMass' problem with balance beam has been highlighted. It was this event which cost them their only defeat this season, by Springfield. In Easterns too, this event will probably be the focal point of the meet.

Betsy East believes that the outcome of the balance beam will determine the outcome of the meet. She added that on all other events UMass should definitely beat Springfield.

All this attention placed on beam adds extra pressure on the women who compete on it. Jodi Hitt, beam and floor specialist puts it this way. "As a beam specialist, I feel like a lot of responsibility falls on my event and therefore on me. Although I'm slightly apprehensive, I'm really looking forward to this meet."

All Arounder Jeannine Burger feels that the emphasis on beam is mainly on the competitor's confidence. "That's where I'm putting most of my emphasis this week. On the whole, confidence is very high. The routines are good and everyone is capable of hitting."

And hitting as a team, how can they lose?

As Heidi Armstrong says, "If everyone competing does their job, that complete team effort will be more rewarding to me than the outcome of Easterns. Of course, if everyone does their job, the outcome is obvious!"

Finally, the team confidence and anticipation for this meet is clearly exhibited in Margie Combs' "I want to say only one thing-we're going to win."

And not forgotten is the coach, Virginia Evans, who has coordinated the efforts that have gone into this weekend. Looking forward to a good tough meet, she briefly but firmly states, "The women are ready."

Hoopsters hope height doesn't make NIT might

By STEVE DECOSTA

The weeks of waiting, speculation, and rumor end tomorrow on the court of Madison Square Garden when the Minutemen meet Jacksonville in the opening round of the NIT.

The time for talk has just about run out. The battle of press releases no longer matters. The only thing that counts is how the two teams match up on the hardwood.

The Minutemen travel to New York carrying with them a disciplined type of game, with solid defense and a smooth-operating offensive machine that has the potential to run with the best of teams if the situation arises.

Jacksonville's attributes include a free-wheeling type of attack that revolves around a bevy of individual standout shooters, including Leon Benbow, a 6'5 guard averages 21.0 points per game, and Henry Williams, a 6'6 forward who also hits in double figures for the Dolphins.

Butch Taylor is the big man underneath for Jacksonville. At 6'10 Taylor has the potential to dominate the boards, and he, like Benbow and Williams, also averages in double figures.

UMass will be counting on their five starters, all of whom have playoff experience. Al Skinner, Rick Pitino, Peter Trow, John Murphy, and Bill Endicott were all members of last year's Minutemen squad, which knocked off Missouri in the first round, giving UMass its first NIT victory ever.

The Dolphins will have a height advantage at every position, with the Minutemen giving up at least two inches in the match-ups. John Murphy, at 6'8 will try to keep the lid on the 6'10 Taylor while Williams will be guarded by either Trow or Skinner, both 6'4, and giving away two inches to the Dolphin standout.

The real problem will come in the backcourt where the 6'0 Pitino or 6'2 Endicott must try to contain the much taller Benbow. You might look for Skinner to shadow Benbow if things get out of hand early.

Other players to look for in the Jacksonville line-up are forward Shawn Leftwich, guard Jimmy Clark, and sixth-man Carlos Bermudez. Leftwich will become especially important as he moves to the middle if Taylor gets into foul trouble, as he is prone to do.

A key to the game could be how well the Minutemen hold the Dolphin giants off the boards. UMass led the nation in rebound margin and control in this category has been an important aspect of their fine season thus far.

Another key should be the play of John Murphy. In order for the Minutemen to be effective, Murphy must be able to throttle Taylor and shut off the middle to the Dolphin's penetrating guards. This all means, of course, that big John must stay out of the foul trouble that plagued him in the early part of the season, but which he has since learned to control.

Tap-off time for UMass-Jacksonville is 7 p.m. If you're lucky enough to be going to New York, the second game, beginning at 9, features Fairfield and Hawaii, which boasts the presence of Sporting News All American guard Tom Henderson.

Stick around for the finish, best comes last at Easterns

By WALT POWERS

If the spectacle of head to head competition is what you want, you may leave Friday's Eastern Women's Gymnastics Championships just a little dissappointed, because on each apparatus, each team will compete against itself.

Unlike the men's championships, where three groups of seeded teams compete head to head simultaneously with other groups on separate apparati, each women's team performs alone on each event, then moves on to the next apparatus as another team takes it's place. Since each of the four apparati are in constant use, and each of the twenty-one teams proceeds directly to the next event, the meet has been divided into five time sessions, with the higher seeded teams performing last.

Order of competition was determined by random selection, and each team proceeds to it's next event in Olympic order, vaulting, uneven bars, balance beam and floor.

Each team except Brandeis, Temple, and Westfield will field six competitors in each event. The top three scores in each event are added to make the team score. The top ten individual scores in each event will qualify for Saturday's individual finals. Like the Men's Eastern's, the all-around championship will be determined-from Friday's competition.

A running score will be kept all day, both for the team and the top ten individual event scores.

The top four seeds, Springfield, UMass, Southern Connecticut and Towson State, will perform from 8:30 to 10:00 in the final time slot. Judging prejudices will be largely negated by the separate performances, but the order of events could concievably make a difference. Springfield, the top seed, will finish up on the balance beam, and if the meet is close, will face a "must hit" situation on this difficult event.

The top ten scorers in each event will compete in Saturday's final session. Their Saturday scores will be added to their scores on Friday to determine the individual winners.

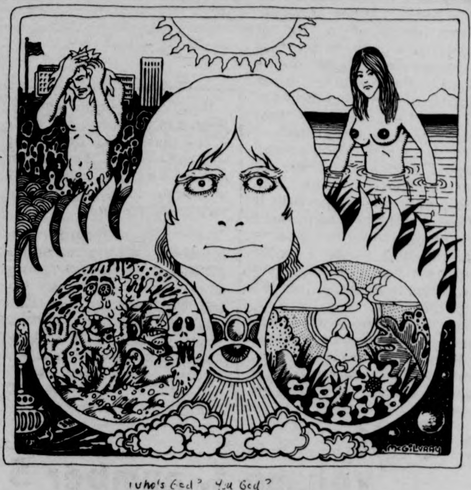
Real Life Sought, Get What You Got

...put it in a LITTLE PAPER BAG and HIT THE ROAD...



who's God? You God?

The Art of Living vs. The Science of Being.

by Gerald E. Kinsey

Author's Note: I choose to write in the present tense, in the style of Richard Alpert, in an attempt to create the most vivid images, sharing his belief that here and now is the only true reality. I am thankful for this opportunity to express myself in such a manner and only regret the limit of length which is imposed on this paper. I shall begin at a point in time just prior to my entrance into the University of Massachusetts. It is 15 January 1969.

I sit with my close friends passing around a bottle. We are in a bomb shelter at the DaNang passenger terminal. There are three or four inches of water on the floor of the shelter and a rocket attack is underway outside. I shall leave DaNang in a few hours; but I won't remember leaving, I won't even remember getting on the plane. I will be too drunk to remember..

The next thing I remember is waking up as the 707 touches down in Kadena Air Base in Okinawa. I am discharged in San Bernadino, California the next day. Relatives pick me up at Bradley Field and we go directly to a wedding in Greenfield, Mass. I leave the reception early. The ritual and the waste disgusts me. I go skiing in Vermont and get drunk. A full week passes and I enter the University. I am not accepted because of my academic accomplishments — I barely finished high school — but they accept me because I am a Viet Nam Veteran. The morally decadent society which fostered me feels guilty for sending me to do its killing and other foul acts in the name of humanity. Now this same perverted society allows me to attend one of its institutes of higher learning.

Since the military taught me electronics and made me a specialist in computerized bombing and killing, I am advised to enter the department of electrical engineering. Much to my disgust, I soon find that the mind of the engineer and the military are almost one and the same. I consider dropping out, but finish the semester.

My first free summer I work for the railroad in Chatham, New York and attend concerts at Tanglewood. I start smoking dope for the first time since the Nam. I attend the concert at Woodstock with some friends and come in contact with an energy I never felt before. In the Fall I change my major to psychology in an attempt to understand myself better. I become more confused and change my major to sociology in the spring semester.

I start to realize that veterans are not the only ones being fucked by the system. I go scuba diving with friends in the Florida Keys during spring vacation. The strike happens and I attend many workshops and discussions. People at Kent State are shot and killed. I experience a feeling of helplessness, an inability to focus my energy in what I feel is a positive direction. I drink and smoke too much.

Summer comes again and I attempt to get my job back with the railroad. They promise me work, but in the end hire no one and go bankrupt. "My girl's" parents accuse me of being shiftless and lazy because I have no job. I finally get a job on construction, but half the summer is gone and I do not feel welcome at "my girl's" home anymore. Summer ends and I change my major to Wildlife partly because of my love of Nature and partly to get my mind off the more pressing issues of our times. I spend much time with my girl in her dorm at Mount Holyoke. I soon find that even Wildlife and Nature are dealt with as commodities that can be bought, sold and controlled by the system. I turn to the woman I love for the answers. She says I ask her for too much. My inability to cope with the system turns her away from me. Her own intellectuality and structure blinds her. She finally ends our relationship at the close of spring vacation. I feel destroyed by this and fly to Florida to live with friends. I feel a closeness with them I have never felt with another group of people. It is similar to the energy that I felt at Woodstock. I start to realize that love is something that is not limited to just one other person. I realize that it is possible to share love with a whole lot of people. My friends encourage me to return to finish out the semester. Three weeks have passed, but with intensive work I successfully complete the semester.

Summer returns and I work on construction. I live with a friend on Onota Lake in Pittsfield. We repair boat engines and teach water skiing part-time in exchange for our rent. I go to Tanglewood most every night and start to see other women. I see my ex-girlfriend there with another guy and this upsets me very much. I quit work and head to Florida. I spend all my time on the beach and become very close to the ocean. I have many good talks with my friends who are surfers. I return to school in September and attempt to establish contact with my old girlfriend. She refuses to see me. I go out with many different people. I become sick of school and drop out.

I meet a large group of people at a commune who are unlike any large group of people I have ever known. They are all naturally high. I am accepted by them and give up all my material possessions. I learn that the secret of this natural high is openness and compassion. I become very close to a woman who believes that she will learn to heal by touch. She teaches me about meditation, reincarnation, the God-force, Christ and Buddha. I experience a feeling of oneness with a large group of people. The only rules of the commune are no drugs, no alcohol, no promiscuity (a physical relationship without a spiritual bond). The commune has a rock band which it uses to express its philosophy to the world. I apply my skills in electronics to building a public address system for the band. I travel to Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Portland, and Montreal buying, assembling, and receiving technical advice on building one of the largest portable sound systems ever constructed. Months pass and the system is completed. I develop a desire to share the spiritual truths I have learned with all the world. I leave the woman and the people I love and return to the outside world. I leave with nothing but the clothes on my back in mid-December of 1971.

The author (pictured above, on pedestal) finds that The farther one travels, the less one knows.

I hear of Viet Nam veterans camping at Valley Forge for Christmas. I go to Valley Forge and march with my brothers on Christmas Eve to protest the war in Viet Nam. Bombs fall on Cambodia while we sing "Silent Night". We camp two hundred strong on the same site where Washington wintered with his troops. On Christmas day we go to visit our brothers in the Valley Forge military hospital. We are refused entry because we do not know any patients by name. In the afternoon we infiltrate Fort Dix which is under maximum security. We sneak in through the rifle range while our brothers stage guerilla theater at the main gate as a diversion. We protest in front of the stockade where many pacifists are imprisoned. We refuse to leave and are beaten by MP's and thrown out of the base and escorted by the New Jersey Highway Patrol to the state line. The next day we are arrested for occupying the Betsy Ross house in Philadelphia. We are thrown into jail and bailed out by our friends the Quakers. The same day we are released, ninety of us are arrested at the Lincoln Memorial. Here I am the last one to be arrested. I stand on top of a huge urn which used to contain the eternal flame. I hold a flag which says 'Viet Nam Veterans Against the War'. I watch my brothers being arrested and carried away to waiting buses. I feel very proud of them; I fight back tears. It suddenly becomes very clear to me that there is no political solution to the problems that the world faces. I surrender to the police and climb down after ignoring them for a long while. A woman breaks through the police and newsmen and kisses me. She is beaten back. In the morning we all go to court after spending the night together in the drunk tank. The judge is Black and smiles at me. We leave D.C. in the afternoon. The police stop our van and say it is overloaded. I hitch alone to Valley Forge.

I drive from there back to Amherst. There is freezing rain on Interstate 91 on this New Year's Eve. I stop to help at an accident where a woman I reach out to help is killed instantly by still another crash. I am knocked down as a car slides sideways into me. I run down the highway and stop traffic by waving my arms. A truck driver gives me flares and I direct traffic for almost an hour before an ambulance arrives. Before I leave someone smashes into the back of my car. I arrive at UMass and sleep in the lounge of a central area dorm.

Real Life Sought, Get What You Got

I re-enter the university and get a single in Butterfield. I meet a woman there whom I become very close to. I decide to major in Natural Resources and become concerned with pollution and over population. I read books on religious philosophy and become very interested in altered states of consciousness. I trip for the first time. In mid-semester I change my major to English and pick up a course in creative writing. I develop a stronger interest in art and classical music and start to draw and write poetry.

In the summer of '72 I return to Florida and trip with friends on the beach. We watch giant sea turtles lay their eggs by the moonlight. We visit a close relative of a friend in Miami and live the life of the idle rich. I soon become sick of it and hitch back to Amherst. I enter summer school, buy a Land Rover, and live in an empty dorm for the remainder of the summer.

In the Fall I change my major to Entomology and start dealing dope by buying pounds with my veterans checks. I spend money like water and attract many good time friends. We do a lot of camping in Vermont and I contemplate dropping out again. Dealing becomes too much and I give it up and move out to the country for the spring semster.

I live on the shore of a beautiful little lake and start to meditate again. I spend a lot of time out in my boat and once again start to see life in its spiritual fullness. I enjoy fixing up the cottage and working in the yard. I have an archery range in the yard and perfect my aim while improving my powers of concentration. I meet a famous psychic who advises me on my spiritual development. Through him I become aware of my past lifetimes that bear a direct relationship to this present one. I become aware of my own psychic abilities which have lain dormant until now; I gradually start to see life in a more clairvoyant manner and try to look on each person with compassion. As I learn to focus my energy in this way, the knowings from individual vibrations allow me to flow with the energy and maintain a balance within myself. I learn to be naturally high. I realize that for my fuller spiritual attainment I must return to the mainstream of life. I am hired as a contractor for the phone company and work full time while still attending UMass. I attend my ex-girl-friend's graduation from Mount Holyoke. She sees me, but does not speak. While supervising the installation of phone systems in many varied work environments I realize that it takes the occupational earth condition of work to balance the spiritual awareness of self. I work until the end of July and leave when union problems arise.

I sell my Land Rover and go alone to Florida to write and meditate on the beach. The industrialization of the peaceful places I once knew drives me away. My car breaks down in Jacksonville and I junk it and hitch home. I meet many good people while hitching and finally arrive in Amherst. I buy an old car and drive to Nova Scotia with two of my best friends. We camp there and share many good times. We attempt a crossing to Newfoundland, but the ferrys are on strike. We return to Amherst and I decide to finish up school. I change my major to psychology because of a growing interest in parapsychology. I realize that whatever is essential for my growth is present wherever I am. I move into Southwest dorm to test my ability to flow with a large number of people in the midst of a sea of negativity. I begin to see that the negativity around me is caused by those who fail to see the outer-dimensional forces of life, the full creativity that constantly surrounds them. I start to write music and discover a focal point for my creative energy while continuing my material pursuit. It is the end of the best semester I have known while in school. I have not had a day I would label as a bad day in a long time. I feel in balance. It is the 4th of December and I write a paper concerned with my search for identity. I attempt to reveal and share with others some of my revelations and experiences on this present journey or lifetime. It is clear to me that not much can be contained within these physical limits. I have only touched on what I have gone through and the revelations I have reached. I plan to graduate in May and at that time I know a new doorway or vibration will be placed in front of me and I will know what to do and where to go to give a fuller spiritual meaning to my life.

If you collect a dead blue jay, wrap it in aluminum foil, place it in a plastic bag, tie the bag shut and freeze it. Then write or call the Society's headquarters at Lincoln, 01773 (259-9500) for further instructions.

Mrs. Gustafson further states: If your dog is following children to school in town, jumping on them at the playground, chasing the bus they are riding to school in or disturbing them while they are waiting for the bus — you are breaking the law.

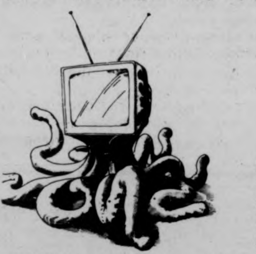
Below The Salt has been the kind of magazine that would print peculiar work. We pledge to uphold this tradition, but can't promise everybody's peculiar work will fit. Yours must be typed, double-spaced, at sixty spaces to the line. The deadline for each Thursday's edition is noon the previous Tuesday; but you can write to us anytime.

"The truth was doomed to die. It was being downtrodden, was being drowned, burned, ground to ashes. But look — it has survived, it lives, it has been printed, and nobody ever will be able to wipe it out."



Proctor & Bergman

(At this point our waiter returns to the table and apologizes for the fact that they are out of the kind of pie Proctor ordered.)

B.T.S.: You don't have any groat clusters he could. . .

Proc.: Yeah, instant groat clusters ... how about some vanilla ice cream?

B.T.S.: Nothing for me, thanks.

Berg.: I'll have the same.

Proc.: Two nothings and one ice cream, please.

(The waiter departs, quickly.)

B.T.S.: I'm still working my way through Rat, I've listened to it about six times. . .

Proc.: We found it very entertaining to do because for us it was a combination of the dramatic and ... there were lots of ideas that we spent a great deal of time over.

Berg.: It has a lot of ideas, it's got a lot of clues.

Proc.: But performing it, we really enjoyed the dramatic and comedic action that was in it. It was a hell of a lot of fun to do that album. It's a wild piece.

Berg.: It's like when we used to do By the Light of the Silvery — Because obviously we're going to wind up doing Rat on the stage at some point, or a movie.

Proc.: Yeah. We've all expressed the desire to do that — it'll probably be our next stage or film. . .

Berg.: 'Cause it's very stageable, I've gotta tell you; By the Light of the Silvery was staged, and it was a wild — it was our favorite piece on stage. And we could take and do a four-man version of The Giant Rat of Sumatra onstage. We could just adapt. . .

Proc.: We did a mad thing with By the Light of the Silvery in which we changed identities to get around the limitations of having only four people to play twelve parts, and Flotsam and Stones would constantly change identities. We'd go in one door and out the other, changed: I'd be Flotsam, he'd be Stones and then we'd walk through again and we changed again. Oh, it was marvelously insane.

Berg.: In fact, we could probably do it onstage so that the deerstalker hat and the calabash would represent Hemlock Stones — anybody who had those would be Stones. And the old man could have a gray wig and a moustache and that's Flotsam and Stones and everybody else, 'when you're wearing that, that's who you are, and you'll play those characters' ... because we can all do the same voices. I've found that out, because I've started to listen ... and over the years we've really learned ... but I'll be damned if Phil Austin, Peter Bergman, Dave Ossman and Phil Proctor don't sound like the same guy, sometimes. In Nick Danger we all played Nancy. No, Dave Ossman didn't. The thing is that each person in the Firesign brought a group of voices in at the beginning. And, you know, Phil Proctor would bring voices in and I'd listen to those voices over a period of six years ... and I could do them. So I could play Hemlock Stones and he could play Harry "The Hawk" Lungett. We should be able to exploit that changeability for theatrical. . .

Proc.: Rocky Rococo became Rocky Rocomoto when Peter picked up on Phil Austin's interest in Japan and transmuted the character into a Japanese strip-show entertainer.

Berg.: Have you seen the movie Martian Space Party? It's still playing with Reefer Madness? Well, our new film, TV or Not TV, is being premiered in New York. . .

B.T.S.: Didn't you have another short film, Blue Planet Weekend?

Berg.: Blue Planet Weekend is the film we're working on — that's going to be a major film. I have a project going with a couple of friends, that I produce, called Love is Hard to Get. You'll get TV or Not TV — all those should come out on videotape so you guys can sit and study them — those films are worth studying for comedy and for theater.

Proc.: We may be putting together a series of our three films in a thing called Firesign Funnies and releasing that.

Next week: more.

BLACK NEWS SERVICE

by Pat Grundy

The widely acclaimed novel, Things Fall Apart, by U-Mass Professor Chinua Achebe has been adapted for the stage by the dynamic director, actress and teacher, Sister Ester Terry, and will be presented tonight, Saturday and Sunday at 8:00 p.m. in Bowker Auditorium. The novel describes English Colonization and its impact on the lives of a people in a traditional African village. The creative collaboration of these two highly talented Black faculty members should prove to be a very exciting experience.

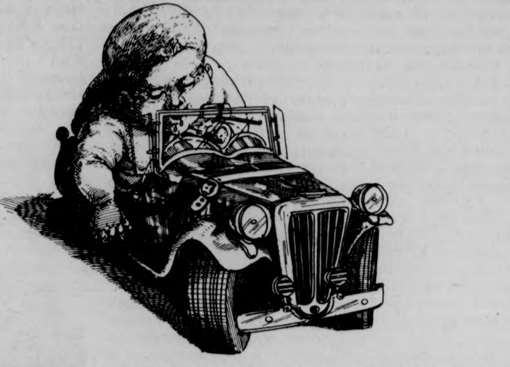
Energy E$$ence = Oil (All?) Monopolies

HAVE YOU SEEN the latest oil company advertisements which have a strong tendency to push the corporate image in the direction of nirvana? More on this later, but first this very important message:

Got a car? Feel down in the dumps 'cuz your gas devouring monster needs a frequent nip? Paying 60 cents a gallon or so to quench its thirst? Well, do not blame yourself, your local gas station attendant, or the Semites, and it is too easy to pick on Richard Nixon (and for good cause too, 'cuz Dear Richard received $4,981,840 in Campaign '72 oil industry contributions). You can, however, point your dipstick at the Big Seven who are the dominators of the world petrol scene. These multinational culprits consist of five American firms — Exxon, Texaco, Mobil, Standard of California, and Gulf — British Petroleum, and Royal-Dutch Shell. In combination they control 47 per cent of world tanker tonnage, 50 per cent of refining capacity, more than half the world's marketing network, and 81 per cent of the output of the 11 principal oil exporting countries, excluding Canada and the USSR. According to the August 14, 1973 edition of the "Wall Street Journal", hardly considered an anti-business paper, "The energy 'crisis' ... may be the best thing that's happened to the oil and gas business in a long time." Now you may say that all you have to do is convert to natural gas for home heating or increase coal and atomic power (sic). Well, they have you covered. Reach! The top 25 oil corps hold 72 per cent of gas reserves, 50 per cent of coal, 80 per cent of atomic, and 60 per cent is their interest in electricity, according to CBS-TV—"The Real Paper." Exxon bought seven billion tons of coal reserves which amounts to the largest in the country. Island Creek Coal, the third biggest, was bought by Occidental Petroleum. 43 million coal acres are in the back pocket of Atlantic-Richfield, which makes that company the second largest holder of fed coal leases. When subsidiaries, etc., are taken into consideration, the top oil companies actually control about two-thirds of the coal market. Moving into the nuclear family, Shell married Gulf to have a baby, i.e., a nuclear reactor. They are the third largest reactor contractor today.



Will the American public ever grow up? Or will it be grown up?

Thesis: Enterprise is Free if you own one. 94 per cent of the crude reserves, 70 per cent of the production, 86 per cent of refining, and 79 per cent of the sales of petro is controlled by the top 20 oil companies. When the "crisis" started its crunch, well over a thousand gas stations — mostly independents — closed down. It is well known that independents have always been a thorny problem for the majors.

The 1971 meetings between the Organization of Petroleum-Exporting Countries (OPEC) and the majors produced an interesting fact. While British motorists were paying over 70 cents per gallon, the oil companies claimed they were "only" making 33 cents on the barrel. The producing country netted three cents on the gallon. Meanwhile, prices were rising, the oil companies widened their profit margin, and the producing country stagnated. So the companies could not lose. Profits, huge profits were made from the consumer and the producer. In those days it was a relatively simple matter to bribe a few highly placed producing country officials like King Idris of Libya (who was overthrown September 1, 1969).

You have been told the fairy tale about "the annual industry profits required to meet investment needs." The source for the profit projection is Chase Manhattan Bank. It's no mere coincidence that a major stockholder in Exxon (which is the largest) happens to be Chase Manhattan.

William Simon claims an oil shortfall of 2.5 million barrels a day. Richard Nixon claims a shortfall of 3.7 million bpd. The Government Bureau of Mines claims the oil companies had substantial stockpiles of petro going unused. Ralph Nader says the oil "shortage" is an industry myth that was designed for oil industry motives, e.g., increased profits.

Just like the old shieks, a sad proportion of Washington's politicians are recipients of sizeable gifts from the oil barons. Witness the failure to pass appropriate legislation to deal with the bandits. An oil price rollback is needed (as well as development of alternative energy supplies like solar power and even garbage and waste power). If the oil companies balk, and there would be a good chance that additional oil reserves would be kept in storage tanks in order to rescind any real rollback, then the message would be quite perfectly clear. Nothing less than a Public Corporation would have to be formed in the interest of the people. Ask your congressperson and senator about this. Demand an answer and if they hedge on the solution — be they Democrat or Republican — we had better get together and support alternative candidates when that time comes.

NOW LET'S GO BACK to the first question. If you believe the oil companies' broadcast ads should be counter-balanced, the Public Interest Communications Group would like your support. The networks (ABC, NBC, CBS) are balking at a proposal that would provide airtime to the other sides of the oil companies' biased claims. Congressman Benjamin Rosenthal of New York is working on legislation to guarantee fairness with regards to broadcast commercials. Specifically, his measure would at least allow opposing viewpoints to the oil industry's propaganda to be presented.

Self-Portraits

THE PAINTER

On his twentieth birthday, Cedric Leland bought a painting kit. There had been no evidence previously of either his talent or his inclination; after he had put away the horsies and curl-smoke houses and bulb-headed self-portraits of his childhood, he had never been known to try to depict anything, until he now furiously attacked the problems of brush technique and color value. Shortly his landscapes became less primitive, his still lives acquired dimension, his figures evolved into believable proportion. He showed a marked propensity for portraiture, and his intimates recalled the intense stares he gave them before he began to paint them, from memory, almost perfectly.

As time went on his work showed a double thrust; in addition to portraiture, he worked with unnatural fervor or forest landscapes. At first he went for long walks in the arboretum, to understand the shapes of his subjects, how they grew and branched, how their bark took the leaf-filtered sunlight. He had a dream that he was Abe Lincoln splitting rails; when an educated friend reminded him that great Leonardo had dissected many corpses in order to better portray human figures, Leland decided he'd studied his trees long enough. Henceforth he stayed at his easel, turning out ferocious scenes of equestrian woodland princes and classical forest themes. His third "Pyramus and Thisbee" was purchased for a goodly amount by an admiring oil magnate, who would have bought all his canvasses had Leland not flatly refused to accept commissions.

With the money now coming in Leland leased a small rural cottage which, with little effort, became a perfect studio. He now worked feverishly, leaving his cocoon so seldom that rumors of the Mad Painter began to spread: if he were ever to be hungry, they said, he would paint himself a roast. He assumed, and rightly, that he had enough money that he need not sell another painting for some years, so he plunged into the work he was pursuing with new energy. He was now attempting the construction of portraits, to paint a complete, logical, accurate human face from literary description, or from chance epithets, and finally from scratch. In a jocular mood one day he painted Andrew Jackson from the engraving on the ten-dollar bill — it looked as if the President had sat for it himself, and more, as if the image were about to laugh at his own joke.

His woods, however, having already become as realistic as possible, began now to acquire unearthly characteristics. One of his last few friends spotted one of these on a rare visit; "Camelot!" he breathed, though there were no castles or knights or any identifying features at all in the painting, just his peculiar trees. They looked like the sort of woods where gods and demons are wont to gambol and ply their talents, and the likeness was too close for any coincidence. The best paintings definitely betrayed some knowledge of, perhaps even communication with, the denizens of these eldritch forests. Leland showed none of this, however, and was perfectly at ease whenever he was willing to lay down his brush for an occasional caller.

"The ancient Greeks," he said, "saw their world as ordered and harmonious; their stark classical treatment of women emphasizes the harmony they expect to perceive. Men of the Middle Ages preferred their women submissive and fecund; they painted them frail and exaggerated their bellies. Renaissance men merely liked them a lot, and so portrayed them plump and abundant. Every man paints his ideal, the complement of his soul, his heart's desire." So saying, he dismissed all his friends, warning them not to try to visit him again for some time. He bought a fabulous stock of food and supplies, stretched and prepared an immense canvas, and took pains to ensure a long span of total solitude and concentration.

No one knows where his bride Lorelei came from, but all agree she is very lovely, and seems to be made for him. And many have seen what became of that canvas; it is the best of his woodscapes, of a faery clearing in moonlight, but no one can look at it without getting the impression that some important central pictorial element is missing. No one knows why he laughingly calls the painting "Pygmalion", but everyone wishes he would break his resolution never to touch a paintbrush again.

DARKNESS

The cup on the table is only a memory —
Two cigarettes burn where fingers used to be
And the air is cold. A bird
Strikes the window, and breaks the silence.
Surely I'll remember her, in bed,
Where I'll toss wearily, turning the Darkness to fit my mistakes.
The air that we breathe is foul.
Jeopardy strikes once, like a
Capricorn trying to break a house down
And then it's over, all over
Like gulls once they have mated.

TEN GREATEST LP'S

Let me start off by asking you a question. Is it surprising to you that a rightist would comment on his choices for the best all-time LP's? Those of you who know other Birchers know of the condemnations placed by some of us on good ol' Rock and Roll, but those of you who do know me well know that the music I really prefer is that same R&R from 1952-66.

Yes, ladies and gentlemen, I am an oldies freak. And I am not ashamed of it. In fact, I don't listen to anything else. Sure, I enjoy some of the other, but I'm hooked on WACE, and the old records they play.

So, people, here are my selections for the top ten LP's, or rather, groups of LP's that could make up such a list.

1) 20 YEARS OF NO. 1 HITS — VARIOUS ARTISTS (COLUMBIA)

One of the best rock anthologies available. It starts off with Johnnie Ray's "Cry" and ends with Mac Davis' "Baby, Don't Get Hooked On Me". In between those two, there are eighteen other goodies which include "And When I Die", "The Battle of New Orleans", "Rose Garden", "Big Bad John", "El Paso" and "Chances Are". These are all done by the individuals or groups that made them million sellers. It has something for everybody. Released in fall, 1973.

2) THE BEST OF THE BEACH BOYS, VOLS. 1, 2, and 3. (CAPITOL)

I put these together because they make up the best anthology on one of the top groups of all time. Volume One has "Surfin' U,S.A.", "Surfer Girl" and "Little Deuce Coupe"; Volume Two has "409", "Surfin Safari", "I Get Around", "California Girls" and "Barbara Ann"; Volume Three has "Good Vibrations", "Surfin'", "Heroes and Villains", "Darlin'" and "Dance, Dance, Dance." Volume One (1966) and Volume Two (1967) were million sellers, Volume Three (1968) wasn't. I can't understand why, it was as good as the other two.

Bob Estelle doesn't like this.

3) JAN AND DEAN ANTHOLOGY ALBUM (UNITED ARTISTS). If you remember the surfing and hot rod craze of 1962-63, Jan and Dean, along with The Beach Boys, were the main groups of the era. Of the many Jan and Dean albums available, I choose this two record set because the first three sides contain the best of their hits, from "Jennie Lee" (1958) to "Popsicle" (1967).

The other hits on this album are "Baby Talk", "Surf City", "The Little Old Lady From Pasadena", etc. Released in 1972.

One other thing I ought to mention is that Jan Berry was in a bad auto accident in 1966 which left him almost a vegetable. He has shown remarkable progress with speech and physical therapy to the point where he and Dean Torrance got together again on one of Dick Clark's specials. Let us all pray for Jan's recovery and hope that he will make it.

4) THE MOTOWN STORY (MOTOWN). I picked this one over the K-Tel 64 Greatest one because this one has the best 40 of the Motown hits as well as the narration about these hits. It's a five record set which was released in 1970 on a limited basis. If you find a copy and have the bread, grab it.

5) THE DAVE CLARK FIVE'S GREATEST HITS, VOLS. 1 and 2. (EPIC) I put these two together because ten songs aren't enough to show how good this English group was. The first one, with "Over and Over", "Catch Us If You Can", "Bits and Pieces" and "Glad All Over" is better, but the second volume has a lot of goodies too. Remember "Try Too Hard" and "Please Tell Me Why?" Both were released in 1966.

6) ECHOES OF A ROCK ERA, 3 VOLS. (ROULETTE). Roulette isn't much of a record company nowadays, but they have had some biggies in the past. The three sets I am talking about are double LP's so there are six records in all. Here is a sampling: Volume One: (1951-57) "School Days" (Chuck Berry), "Why Do Fools Fall In Love" (Frankie Lymon), "Party Doll" (Buddy Knox); Volume Two: "Peppermint Twist" (Joey Dee), "Bristol Stomp" (Dovells, "I Only Have Eyes For You" (Flamingos). Volume Three: "My Guy" (Mary Wells), "Maybe" (The Chantels), etc. This is only a sampling of ε must set. All were released in 1972, each sold separately.

Do these people like Bob Estelle?

7) THE BEST OF THE ANIMALS (MGM). This is where Eric Burdon got his start. He and another group member, Alan Price, updated "House Of The Rising Sun" and "I'm Crying" to start the group off. Then came "Boom Boom", "Don't Let Me Be Misunderstood", "We Gotta Get Out Of This Place" and six others that showed The Animals to be a top group that may not have been appreciated until they broke up. Released in 1966.

8) THE BEATLES 1962-66 (APPLE). Now I imagine you don't think I really dig the stuff in the 1967-70 album. Well, you're right. But the Beatles had some great stuff in their early years, and if one were to try and pick out the best sampling, this would have to be it. Released in 1973.

9) THE FOUR SEASONS GOLD VAULT OF HITS (AND SECOND VAULT). (PHILIPS). Either you really liked this group or you hated them. I liked them and still do. These two LP's have all the best this group had to offer. Gold Vault had the Philips singles including "Ronnie", "Rag Doll", "Let's Hang On" and "Dawn". Second Vault has the Vee-Jay hits and some Philips hits released after "Gold Vault". They include "Sherry", "Walk Like A Man", "Big Girls Don't Cry", "Working My Way Back To You" and "Stay". Released in 1966 and 1967, respectively.

10) BUDDY HOLLY — A ROCK AND ROLL COLLECTION (DECCA). Gentlemen and ladies, I have saved the best for last. They say that when Don McLean talked about the music dying, he meant Holly's death in a 1959 plane crash. All the goodies are on this double LP: "Peggy Sue", "That'll Be The Day", "Oh Boy!", "Maybe Baby" and many others that exemplify the star that was Buddy Holly. If you've never heard him, you must. If you're into Holly, get this one. Released in 1972.

GREVIOUS ANGEL - GRAM PARSONS (Reprise MS 2171) time 36:12

Beautiful, beautifully appreciated country music is found in abundance on Gram's last real album, with he and Emmylou Harris combining for some full-hearted singing.

Standing out are "Love Hurts", "Las Vegas", "$1,000 Wedding" and a hilarious 'live' "Cash On The Barrelhead" — "Hickory Wind" medley with a howling crowd, drunks busting bottles and general Northern Ottawa carryings-on.

Goodbye Gram, it's good to hear some of the directions you had in mind as you de-Byrded yourself into purer Parsons forms. The man had soul. B+

In Concert:
John Hammond, Michael Polacco
At The Hatch
Feb. 28

Gratitude. That is the first word, feeling, that comes to mind — first to the musicians, for granting us the privilege of sharing their visions for an hour, or an instant. Also, to everyone responsible for this evening — the Hatch management, the entertainment committee, the bartenders, the janitors, and the good people of Massachusetts who pay for this school's maintenance.

Anger. At the rudeness, the lack of perception of so many of those who were there. The hoots, catcalls and whistles, disturbing the concentration of the musician, destroying the fathomless tension between him and the rest of the audience.

(A while ago, when I was more into the music scene — vicariously, through a boyfriend — I became familiar with a type known to the musicians as the "idiot dancer." It was he who danced with no rhythm or taste, ostentatiously, as close to the spotlight as possible, at every opportunity. I see that those hooters and catcallers have much in common with that lost breed. They want the attention, praise and adulation of 'the crowd' — but they have no talent or ambition, so they gain their glory vicariously by distracting the already focused attention of a group that has come to see another perform.)

John Hammond . . . to me, a vague memory of attractive sounds from seven years ago, and not heard since. Ah! A gift, a great talent, for a dollar on the drunken floor of the Hatch . . . One who has caught the essence of the thing and will share it with us. Mr. Hammond is amazing. (Glory be to God that there are some who can get up and do what some of us feel.) It is difficult to speak of his technical abilities, since what carries them is his spirit, and without that they would be nothing. His voice and his guitar work are the direct links he uses to connect with us . . . and in the spaces between notes, the quiet times, the gift is complete.

The Michael Polacco Group was very interesting to me. All four are talented musicians, and when they get into their jazzy vaguely South American riffs, the sound can be really nice. The wind player, was particularly fine, playing flute, clarinet ad piccolo extraordinaire. The bass player was also decent, moving around on stage more than most I've seen, seeming happy to be there, and the drummer (percussionist) used some interesting sticks for various effects. Mr. Polacco ties the group together with acoustic guitar and vocals, and is best at a kind of 'bop shoop de doop' syllable sound that just means good times. In the second set there were some dancers on the floor who were really into their music, and good at translating it into movement, and it was a pleasure to watch them.

I had to leave before the end of John Hammond's second set because I couldn't overcome the bad vibes I got from the drunken noisemakers. I don't know if holding the concert in a place without access to liquor would have made any difference or not; anyway, I certainly enjoyed being able to drink. But it's too bad; someone should teach us all how to listen when we're very young.

Dear Collegian Editorial Staff,

The enclosed is a counter-review, or alternative review, of the concert given at the Hatch on (2-28-74). My aim is three-fold: 1) I wanted to write it — words were coming at me as I watched and listened this evening; 2) I would like to review other shows and-or write other articles occasionally; and 3) I think one of the most vital and creative things you are in the position of power to effect is to allow and encourage those outside the Collegian staff (that's 20 or 30,000 people at U. Mass., right?) to contribute to your-their newspaper. I know how easy it is to gloat upon a position of power and to stagnate within it — you are young enough and possibly free enough to see that it is absolutely vital that we learn to share willingly and joyously our power as well as our insights. Those of you who have been at U.Mass or on the Collegian for a while no doubt know how little use is made of the vast resources available here by most of the people.

Well, now here is a chance, a gift, to make use of the little bit of power you have been given, to expand it by sharing it with me . . . and others. I challenge you, dare you, goad you, invite you to publish what I have typed (if it meets your editorial standards, of course.)

Sincerely,
Alexis Soule Murphy

My response to Ms. Murphy's letter is one of delight. I certainly welcome unsolicited articles like this, and indeed wish to "share willingly and joyously "my power" with any of you who have anything to say. My thanks to Alexis for highlighting our position and bringing this to our attention.

Taylor-Made Energy

by Garuman Gomes

The Cecil Taylor Unit
An Overview
"Live" at the Jazz Workshop in Boston

"Ive got to warn you: Don't throw yourself into this concert fully. It's like nothing you've ever seen before. I came here earlier this week, threw myself into the concert entirely, and was exhausted by the time I left. You'll feel completely drained at the end of the concert if you're not careful. He's incredible."

The words of energy overload were conveyed to me by a friend of mine I met while waiting for Mr. Taylor's Unit (Taylor-piano, leader; Jimmy Lyons, alto sax; Sirone aka Norris Jones, bass; Andrew Cyrille, percussion.;, to take the stage in Boston. The note of warning had extra weight added to it, since he and I had both seen Ornette Coleman in person a few years earlier, and underwent a period of enlightenment concerning the possibilities of musical form from that concert. Adding to the impression of monstrous energy was the piano tuner (which Taylor insists upon as part of his contract wherever he plays) removing a bass string from the piano. David Sokol picked up the string, and we examined it carefully, only to find that it had apparently been snapped (quite neatly) by Cecil's relentless attack on the piano the night before. Reinforced wound steel — snapped! I repeated the warning Tom had given me earlier, and we braced ourselves.

At approximately 9:45 p.m., the Unit came out and took position. Jimmy Lyons stood to the side, calmly smoking a cigarette; Cyrille propped himself up behind and on top of his kit, face and body full of alertness; Sirone (the newest member of Taylor's Unit, and the most monstrous 'new' bass musician around, judging from his work with Leroy Jenkins and Jerome Cooper in the Revolutionary Ensemble out of Chicago) picked up the bass as a thing near and dear to him; then, Taylor enters.

A few tentative rumblings on the piano by Taylor which remind one of an earthquake about to start, followed by a reply from Cyrille, and then Sirone, Taylor and Cyrille are moving in leaping patterns, like some gigantic hurricane of sound. Taylor is taking incredible leaps on the keyboard, covering almost all combinations of notes possible on the instrument. Simultaneous arpeggios in either direction spurting from both hands, covering every possible configuration on the [illegible] Sirone is humming on [illegible] bass, but the hum is not oc[illegible]ng from just one drone no[illegible] bass, but from thousa[illegible] note clusters and unbe[illegible] fast runs on the [illegible]ent. Cyrille, in the ti[illegible] occurring, is not kee[illegible] but rather creating [illegible] with the drums, [illegible] Taylor and Si[illegible] then breaks off into several variations on the same thing, then begins to sear in and out of the new quadrologue. (Lyons' approach to the sax almost sounds like a contradiction of itself — his tone is mellow, and as he bends notes, he slurs them, but the energy — and that's what this Unit is about dear friends —, is searing and knife-edged as well.) Taylor is still keeping up the steady expansion of the music's thrust, both accompanying Lyons and adding tone cluster ornaments in the background. Ideas are flashing back and forth between everybody, so that the music takes upon a universal aspect, with wave upon wave of crashing sound occurring between the players. Thousand note-per-second-wave-crash-sound-hummm-m-m-m-ming-dexterity — explosion-imploding passion. Taylor is throwing his entire body into it, taking ballet-type leaps with his hands over the keys, caressing one minute, the next minute -- drum as piano as melody. Sirone keeps it building and releasing, as does Cyrille. A few more notes get thrown in, for good measure, and Taylor throws down an "off" pattern on piano. Finis. The time is now 10:20, and Taylor splits almost immediately after the set is finished. I see the people at the workshop picking their brains up from the floor. Others just sit there stunned for a few minutes, still recovering from the initial shock waves. Jesus Christ, I mutter, Tom was right!

INTERMISSION

Cecil Taylor "began" by graduating from the New England Conservatory of Music, and started heading around New York in the late fifties, checking out the talents that had lain dormant there for so many years along with the slav[illegible]stem' in th[illegible]and, to [illegible] truth, [illegible] have troub[illegible]ding [illegible]cians open enou[illegible]play [illegible] His spew of [illegible]uck [illegible]d in 1957, with th[illegible]ase [illegible]e only LP still [illegible]able from that time — Looking Ahead, with an assorted lineup of musicians. Later on, he recorded albums in the early sixties and late fifties with such musical visionaries as the late John Coltrane, Archie Shepp, and worked a few dates with the giant Albert Ayler, that are unfortunately unavailable.

In the meantime, Cecil was finding, as so many Black musicians before him had, that it was no easy thing to make a living by being an uncompromising innovator. He would often go into an agency, ask the agent for a gig, hear some one inside the office do a watered-down version of what he'd done, then be refused the job.

Quite naturally, despite (or perhaps, because of) the overwhelming strength of his music, he went through almost a decade of scuffling at second-rate jobs, and released only four albums during a ten year period — Live at the Cafe Montmartre (on Fantasy), Unit Structures (Blue Note), 1966 Conquistador (Blue Note) 1969, and one entire record on the Jazz Composers Orchestra double record set.

In the seventies, with growing interest in 'jazz' in academia, Taylor was hired, to a post at the University of Wisconsin, then resigned when the University revoked two-thirds of his grades (two-thirds in his class flunked). He was quickly hired by Antioch College, along with fellow Unit members Jimmy Lyons and An[illegible] Cyrille. A bit later, for rea[illegible] still unknown to this re[illegible]r, he was asked to quit by [illegible]ioch. Goodbye, radical ch[illegible]

[illegible] time Taylor made sure tha[illegible]e wouldn't be taken to ro[illegible] city by major record companies for forming his own label, Unit Core records, and released his first album on that label, Indent, written for and performed [illegible] pianist, Taylor.

And Taylor [illegible]eed the quintessence of explosive piano work, culminating a tradition that includes Art Tatum, Bud Powell and Thelonious Monk on one side, and Bartok, Stravinsky and beyond on the other. As a result, Taylor's Technique is the quintessence of every style and form — everything he's ever learned, and a lot that he had to unlearn from his conservatory training. His attack reminds one of nothing so much as an immense tempered drum kit being struck, with twelve tone arpeggios sprinting from both hands simultaneously.

END OF INTERMISSION

Taylor sprints onstage and launches a lavish sequence on piano, Andrew Cyrille becomes an explosive force, and Jimmy Lyons sears upward. Christ, this has even more energy than the last one!

Sirone, big celestial grin of a man, stands plucking the bass in major polyphonic leaps, with Taylor answering his every nuance while pushing Sirone further out. They bring the song tight with another Lyons' solo, Cyrille announces the end with massive, savage drum spurrs, and Taylor writes the end with a final line. Finis.

Taylor is one of the giants of world music. His approach to group improvisation, and his revolutionary treatment of the piano, have won him countless critical accolades, and quite deservedly so. A lot of the former giants of what is referred to as the 'avant garde' are now dead — Coltrane, Dolphy, Ayler — or still living in relative obscurity, aside from established names like Taylor, Coleman and Sun Ra (and they're not exactly wallowing in gold). Actually, one of the finest things you can do for yourself is to introduce your spirit to the music of the spheres, and try to erase the barriers your mind might have to these systoms, for they are truly liberating and beautiful experiences.

Taylor has just released another album on Unit Core. You can get in touch with Unit Core, and order Spring for Two Blue-J's, a book of Taylor's writing, or various other items by writing UNIT CORE, P.O. BOX 3041, NYC, NY, 10001. Please do. You really have nothing to lose in the proposition, and a whole new world of music to gain.

Cecil Taylor is a monster. His performance at the Jazz Workshop opened new worlds to me; new ideas and conceptions about 'the piano', music, art, life, everything. He is certainly as good as anyone I have ever seen and-or heard. It was one of those displays of true greatness that cannot be adequately described, only alluded to in vague terms. All I can really say that might have any clear meaning to you is that seeing Cecil Taylor changed my way of living and thinking, as all great Art (and this is as Great as any) must do.

Dishevel The Peanut–Fog A Hamburger

IN CONCERT:
Aerosmith and the Blue Oyster Cult
March 9th
Orpheum Theatre, Boston

Although Aerosmith was introduced at last Saturday's show as the "baddest band that ever came out of Boston" they had been outclassed before they ever hit the stage by New York's "baddest", the Blue Oyster Cult. Before I get too many raised eyebrows for slanting the review, I must admit my admiration for 'Buck Charma' and the Cult verges on fanatic, while I found Aerosmith's first album only mildly interesting. Nevertheless, the story was told in crowd reaction: the Blue Oyster Cult, playing material largely unfamiliar to the audience, was received with wild approval. The magic had hit Boston.

The Cult played tightly, crisply, with an amazing amount of energy and innovation, the kind of music that is their strength: powerful minor-key "hard rock" (how's that for categorization?). Performing half of their second album, Tyranny and Mutation, and numbers from both their first and soon-to-be-released third album, they wrapped the audience up into their sound, style and mood, raising the energy-level to a peak that left the primarily teenage crowd screaming, demanding the benumbing encore: "Born to be Wild."

Benumbing is a fine word to describe the Cult live. Not only is the assault physical (They start by playing at sonic boom level and then crescendo: in the 'little' Orpheum theatre the effect was really 'stunning'(but they really are amazing, almost awe-inspiring, in how well they pull off the kind of music they play, and the amount of professionalism with which they control the mood of the audience. With a couple years more practice, they may indeed get the act to the point where they will be among America's best bands. They're working hard at living down the bad connotations 'hard rock' earned for itself during its late sixties' excesses.

This is not to say that the performance was perfect. Both J. Bouchard's bass guitar solo and Buck Dharma's big solo of the night (the one backed up by the drummer — his later solo answered by four guitars was fantastic) were disappointing, and bordered on self-indulgent. Also, in places things were a bit raw and out of control. Control well describes the Cult's playing, especially when we come to Buck Dharma, the band's lead guitarist. His precise, clean and energetic guitar playing seem almost out-of-place when you see him standing casually on stage in white jeans and shirt amidst the thunder and his fellow band members in rock's wildest costumes. His playing is without direct precursing, and he is a master of the short break, much of his best playing being "back-up'. Finally, Eric Bloom, the band's lead singer, also stands out among a group of five superlative musicians, bolstering his weak and scruffy voice with stage dynamism.

After a short break, Aerosmith, 'plagued by technical problems', played all their hits for the hometown crowd. They were great, although a bit stiff and nervous, but still ...an anticlimax.

MUSIC FROM FREE CREEK — VARIOUS ARTISTS
(The Famous Charisma Label) time 66:45

If this is what Our Favorite Rock Stars do when they're 'messing around having fun', then they (and us) are in plenty trouble. . .

This 'Great Super-Session Rip-Off Chase' hasn't been released in this country and probably never will be, due to contractural hassles with many of the 'Stars' parent companies, but I would think that the artists (Beck, Clapton, Rundgren, Emerson, Ronstadt, Dr. John, Chris Wood) involved would be more interested in preserving their reputations, as this swirl of doodles is mostly merely dumb.

Two records: as usual, one too much. I guess they couldn't bear to cut the sensitive "Girl From Ipanema" or the campy "Hey Jude". Anyway, the only originals on here are bland jam patterns conked out by various stiffs hanging around the studio, mostly by Mark 'Moogy' Klingman, Rundgren's second keyboard player. The two Linda Ronstadt cuts are up to her standards, and Keith Emerson does some nice things with Eddie Harris' "Freedom Jazz Dance", but you gotta wait quite a while for something to happen.

This really is some sort of monument, some incredibly overblown goof run amuck into a Spectacle that, hopefully, Just Goes To Show. Buy this if you have a fascination for Famous Names and Rare Events. C-

THE TAIN — HORSLIPS
(Atco SD 7039)

Where Horslips' first album Happy to Meet...Sorry to Part appeared directionless in its eclecticism, The Tain (pronounced 'toyn') resoundingly etches a significant musical mark for these Irishmen. Meet....Part went pretty much unnoticed (no thanks to me) on this side of the Atlantic, which is unfortunate though not surprising in the existing mercantilistic recording rat race. Horslips' foreign sound is an interesting blend of old folk and modern rock, an updating of familiar and not so familiar musical themes, reset and remodeled to behoove the contemporary era.

THE TAIN HORSLIPS
PROMOTIONAL DJ COPY

The Tain is a concept album based upon an old Celtic legend depicting a cattle raid between two Irish townships. The music, like the interwoven lyrical themes, is updated, and the resulting sound is surprisingly rock-oriented for a group whose members play such exotic instruments as concertina (as pictured on the octaginal cover of Meet...Part), bodhran, and Vileann pipes. In much the same way as Fairport's Babbacombe Lee is best thought of as a folk-rock drama per musica, The Tain is likewise a free-flowing, musically integrated whole. Although more difficult to get into than most current releases and chart-toppers, the time spent with The Tain should prove far more gratifying.

Bad Cop, Good Book

Books on the half-page

World Without End, Amen
by Jimmy Breslin
$6.95 - 329 Pages
The Viking Press
reviewed by Barbara Voorhees

Reading Jimmy Breslin can be like getting a sucker punch in the stomach. Or like scraping your fingernails across a blackboard.

Applied to a story about Irish-Catholics growing up and living in the borough of Queens, city of New York, Breslin's simple, savage style is doubly effective. For this is a story that Breslin knows about; it is what he is and he uses it in his fourth and latest effort, World Without End, Amen.

For those who sat and squirmed and laughed out loud while reading Breslin's The Gang That Couldn't Shoot Straight, this latest work, World will come as a surprise. The same raw simplicity of style which Breslin used to create a rollicking comedy in The Gang is used here to create a melancholy, sometimes shocking look a one man's life.

Dermont Davey, the book's main character, is a twenty-nine-year-old, Irish-Catholic, New York City cop and a drunkard.

"Everything made him uneasy," Breslin tells you about Davey in the prologue. "He was young and he did not like one hour of one day of one week of his life."

Flashbacks show Davey as a boy of seven watching his father try to ram a bed against his mother and pin her to the wall; and as a creative writer who is shamed by the nuns in his parochial school for his bad penmanship.

Davey doesn't love his wife or care about his kids. He's been in and out of the Straight and Narrow, a drunk tank where alcoholic cops are taken to dry out and the force has taken his gun away.

"The other police regard a man not carrying a gun as half a man. 'I might as well go around without a prick'," Dermot Davey said to himself after handing in his guns.

Davey hates "niggers", "wops", "Commies" and just about everyone else that belongs to a minority group. He feels that they deserve to be arrested on false charges simply because they exist and he is in and out of court with them testifying falsely against them for no specific reason except that they make him sick.

After an incident in which he puts out his cagarette in a black transvestite's eye, Davey leaves his wife and mother-in-law off at a bingo game and gets on board a plane for Northern Ireland.

Before this point the book hears perfection; after, the plot seems to flail about aimlessly while Breslin teaches his character a lesson in what it's like to be a member of a minority group. Here we have Davey falling in love with a Communist woman who is obviously doomed to death at the hands of the Protestants. Even Davey himself is pushed around and stepped on over and over again. It becomes tedious reading.

Only Breslin's raw and vivid style of reporting the conditions in Northern Ireland saves this part of the book from falling flat.

Tom Wolfe has said that he and a number of his colllagues, including Jimmy Breslin, with whom he worked on the old New York Herald Tribune, always talked about someday writing "it". "It" was a novel.

In World Without End, Amen, Bresline is a reporter turned novelist or perhaps we should call him a "novelist reporter" whose style is so new, so simple and so good that it almost makes you forget a plot gone sour.

THE PIN-UP: A MODEST HISTORY
by Mark Gabor
Universe Books, N. Y. $6.00 p.222

by Frederic C. Weiss

Besides beer, hero sandwiches, and sporting events, you will find very few common interests among your average student on a college campus and the construction worker who builds college campuses. Their politics are different; tastes in music, entertainment and values also differ accordingly.

One thing that you will see in both the college dorm and the hard hat shanty is "Miss January" staring at you suggestively, setting an imagery for more than tea and biscuits. The pin-up has become an international obsession, a multi-million dollar business, and the catalyst to untold numbers of pipe dreams and fantasies.

Mark Gabor has compiled a book about those who inspire these fantasies entitled, "The Pin-Up: A Modest History. The book is extensive, with the author compiling myriad numbers of pictures and photographs from the calenders, books and posters that have been devoured by an excited (and mostly male) audience more and more over the past few years.

Gabor's book is not an interesting literary work. It is the kind of book that finds itself doggy eared in the back of bookstores, and on the top of coffee tables. A soft cover book, its contents vary from the most modest cheesecake to the most blatant hard core porno.

Judging from the way that The Pin-Up was passed around the Collegian office, there is quite a market for it. Besides for being fun to skim through, some might find it quite relevant to their tastes.

The Pin-Up is a representative and reliable book, giving a fairly accurate picture of the growth of the "Pin-Up". A short list of some of those who appear in the book in some form or another reads like a guest list to the Academy Awards at one time: Marilyn Monroe, Kim Novak, Ann-Margaret, Charles Bronson, Brigette Bardot, Jean Harlow, Gary Cooper, Rock Hudson, Jane Fonda and others. Needless to say not all of the Pin-Ups are nudes, and not all the nudes in the book are memorable either in name or appearance.

The Pin-Up is not a classic book. Yet it has made the best seller list of the New York Times. In addition, it might just come in second to The Joy of Sex, on the list of "Most thumbed through books."
